I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in adjournment until 9:30 a.m., Tuesday, September 17; that following the prayer and pledge, the morning hour be deemed expired, the Journal of proceedings be approved to date, the time for the two leaders be reserved for their use later in the day, and the Senate be in a period of morning business until 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak for up to 10 minutes each, with the first half of the time under the control of the majority leader, or his designee, and the second half of the time under the control of the Republican leader, or his designee; that at 10:30 a.m. the Senator resume consideration of H.R. 5093, the Interior Appropriations Act; that the Senate recess from 12:30 p.m. until 2:15 p.m. for the weekly conferences; that at 2:15 p.m. the Senate resume consideration of H.R. 5005, homeland security; that at 4:15 p.m. the Senate resume consideration of the Interior Appropriations Act with 60 minutes of debate, equally divided between the chairman and the ranking member of the subcommittee, or their designees, prior to the vote on cloture on the Byrd amendment; further, that the live quorum with respect to the cloture motion filed today be waived; and that the cloture vote occur at 5:15 p.m., Tuesday, September 17, without further intervening action or debate.

Before the Chair puts the question, let me consider what I just said.

H.R. 5005, the homeland security bill, I be recognized at that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I overlooked a request of the lady. I thank the fine lady who serves the Senate so well for calling this to my attention. And, for the Record, her name is Lula.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that Members have until 1 p.m., Tuesday, September 17, to file first-degree amendments, notwithstanding a recess of the Senate during that time, and that second-degree amendments be filed until 4:15 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SEPTEMBER IS PROSTATE CANCER AWARENESS MONTH

HON. BENNIE G. THOMPSON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 2002

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my commitment to finding better treatments and, eventually, a cure for an all-too-quiet killer—prostate cancer. Prostate cancer is a deadly disease that affects American men. As protectors of the American family, it is crucial to inform the public of the crucial role a basic medical check-up can play in detecting this potentially deadly disease. In order to achieve this goal, our Nation's premiere health agencies must be fully engaged and adequately funded by Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in 1998, Congress recognized that prostate cancer research was underfunded and, as a result, requested that the National Institutes of Health (NIH) submit a five-year professional judgment budget (1999–2003). The purpose of this document was to demonstrate how best to improve federal prostate cancer research efforts.

Congress received the budget plan in June of 1999. The plan promised an investment of more than $1.5 billion for prostate cancer research. Unfortunately, real investment has fallen short of its projected finding commitment, and prostate cancer research has not kept pace with scientific opportunities and the proportion of the male population who are afflicted with the disease. As a result, the 107th Congress is now asking NIH to provide an updated five-year plan for the next five years.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to instructing NIH to develop a new and achievable five-year plan, Congress must insist on greater accountability to ensure all federal funds for cancer research are appropriately expended for this purpose. An investment in cancer research will not only yield dividends in lives saved but, also, in dollars and cents. Cancer already costs this country more than $150 billion annually. With the "graying" of the baby boomers, it has been estimated by THE MARCH Research Task Force that, if left unchecked, costs associated with cancer will jump to a staggering $200 billion before we see the end of the decade.

In 1971, President Richard Nixon declared American's war on cancer, promising to end its toll on our society within a decade. Each subsequent Administration has reaffirmed this commitment, yet the number of cancer cases and death continue to grow. As you may be aware, more than 1.2 million new cases of cancer were diagnosed in the United States in 2001, and an estimated 553,000 lives were lost. Tragically, prostate cancer represents 15 percent of all cancer cases and accounts for 15 percent of all cancer deaths.

Mr. Speaker. This country can and must do better than this. While recent increases in prostate cancer research funding are welcome and have proved vital, the sad truth is that Congress' efforts have not been sufficient to ensure the most promising paths to treatment and cure are adequately funded or implemented.

I encourage my Colleagues to join with me to ensure our country's war on cancer in general, and prostate cancer in particular, moves forward with a new resolve to beat these dreaded diseases once and for all.

WPS, APA, AND MSDC PRESENT RESILIENCE IN THE FACE OF TERROR: HEALING THE TRAUMA OF 9/11

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 2002

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the Washington Psychiatric Society, the American Psychiatric Association, and the Medical Society of the District of Columbia (MSDC) for collaborating to present "Resilience in the Face of Terror: Healing the Trauma of 9/11." This conference, of interest to primary care, emergency and psychiatric physicians, and other health professionals will be held at the new George Washington University Hospital in Washington, D.C., on Saturday, September 14, 2002.

Resilience in the Face of Terror has several noteworthy goals and objectives: To evaluate our responses to the crisis generated by the attacks in New York, Washington, and Pennsylvania on September 11, 2001; increase our knowledge of the medical dimensions of disasters; learn about the psychological aspects of religious fanaticism and intolerance, and discuss medical, mental health, and public health lessons learned and their applications to prevention and healing of trauma.

This conference will be co-chaired by two exceptional individuals, Dr. Catherine May and Dr. Eliot Sorel, a close friend of mine. Dr. May is the president of the Washington Psychiatric Society (WPS), a practicing physician with expertise in women's health, psychiatric and emergency medicine, and an assistant clinical professor of psychiatry and behavioral sciences, George Washington University School of Medicine and Health Sciences. Dr. Sorel is the president of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, a practicing physician with expertise in mood disorders and psychiatric disorders related to traumatic events, and clinical professor of psychiatry and behavioral sciences, George Washington University School of Medicine and Health Sciences. Other notable attendees include Jeffrey Akman, M.D., president-elect of WPS; Robert Bonvino, M.D., a leader in the Medical Society of the State of New York; Daniel Ein, M.D., chairman of the emergency preparedness committee of MSDC; Colonel Jeffrey Elting, M.D., Medical Director D.C. Hospitals' Bioterrorism Preparedness; Colonel Theodore Nam, M.D., president of the Uniformed Services District Branch of the American Psychiatric Association; Jerrold Post, M.D., professor of psychiatry, Department of Psychiatry and Behavioral Sciences, and political psychology, in the Elliott School of International Affairs, George Washington University; Steven Steury, M.D., chief clinical officer for the District of Columbia Department of Mental Health; Robert Ursano, M.D., chairman, Department of Psychiatry, Uniformed Services University and Health Sciences.

All of the aforementioned individuals and all those participating in the conference deserve commendation for raising awareness of this issue so other health professionals can use the knowledge to help those most affected by the tragedy on September 11. I applaud their generosity and salute their public service.

IN HONOR OF LARRY GREENE

HON. JANE HARMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 2002

Ms. HARMAN. Mr. Speaker, award winning news cameraman, Larry Greene is the latest victim in America's ongoing fight against terrorism.

Larry was working on a special assignment in the Persian Gulf for Los Angeles based KCBS news. On Friday, September 6th, he boarded a U.S. Navy helicopter to capture on film U.S. military personnel as they boarded a Syrian freighter suspected of carrying smuggled Iraqi oil. Minutes later, the helicopter crashed into the ocean, killing Larry and injuring four American sailors.

In his more than 25 years as an investigative journalist, Larry Greene won more than 40 prestigious journalist awards. Among them dozens of Emmys, Golden Mikes, Press Photographer Association awards, and the prestigious Alfred I. Dupont-Columbia University Award. Just last year, Larry was named "photo journalist of the year" by the Southern California Media Association.

In addition to his service in the Persian Gulf, Larry exhibited great bravery by taking on other extremely dangerous assignments such as the El Salvador and Armenian earthquakes, the civil unrest in Haiti, and the events in Saudi Arabia immediately following the September 11th attacks.

I had the privilege of working with Larry when he came to Washington during the Anthrax attacks last October to interview Congressional Members and policy leaders.

My constituents and I will miss the work of this intensely talented newsman who was dedicated to bringing the news from far away home to all of us. Our prayers are with his wife Diana, and their two sons, Clayton and Connor, as well as his colleagues and friends at KCBS.

HONORING ARLENE HEWITT

HON. JAMES P. MORAN

OF VIRGINIA

Friday, September 13, 2002

Mr. MORAN of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the diligent, innovative and civic-minded work of Mrs. Arlene Hewitt. After 35 years of dedicated service to INOVA Alexandria Hospital, Mrs. Hewitt has decided to retire, but her active role as a community leader in the Northern Virginia region will undoubtedly continue.

Raised in Brookline, Massachusetts, Arlene relocated to Alexandria, Virginia with her family in 1967, to join the former Alexandria Hospital in an effort to establish an innovative new program. Keenly aware of the poor social services available to the disadvantaged members of the community, Arlene began her tireless effort to establish and then direct the hospital's first social work department. Through this department, Arlene made numerous accomplishments, including initiating the Senior Health Access outreach program, establishing a hospital employee assistance program, collaborating with the Alexandria Health Department to create an early childhood immunization program, and playing an instrumental role in coordinating initiatives to reduce unintended pregnancies, stamp out teenage smoking and promote bike helmet safety. These socially conscious programs have given an enormous boost to the health services of Alexandria and the Northern Virginia region. Without Arlene's untiring dedication, these highly effective services that continually provide enormous benefits to the region would not exist.

Outside of her job, Arlene has also served in a variety of positions with many outstanding organizations. She is actively involved in her synagogue, serving on the Board of Directors at Alexandria's Beth El Hebrew Congregation. Beginning with an appointment to the Executive Committee and later serving as Committee Chair, Arlene has been associated with the Alexandria United Way for over 30 years. Her unmatched devotion led to her being awarded a life membership to the Alexandria United Way and the prestigious 2002 Alexandria United Way Outstanding Services Award. While most people would end their philanthropic activities here, Arlene has repeatedly gone above and beyond the call to civic duty. She has also served on the Alexandria Committee on Aging, been a charter member of the Alexandria Health Advisory Commission, chaired the Alexandria Chapter of AARP's health council and has been specially recognized by the Northern Virginia Rotary District Governor for outstanding service to the [chyphe]elderly.

Mr. Speaker, words alone cannot adequately describe the communities' gratitude to Arlene Hewitt. She has touched many lives both directly and indirectly and given hope and guidance to those who need it most. It is an understatement to say that INOVA Hospital will greatly miss her presence, but fortunately for Northern Virginia and Virginia's 8th District, her living legacy will continue going strong.

HONORING 30-YEAR NORTHPORT FIRE DEPARTMENT MEMBER JAMES MAHONEY

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

Friday, September 13, 2002

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to praise Mr. James Mahoney, the recipient of the National Volunteer Fire Council's Scott Health and Safety Volunteer Firefighter of the Year Award for the Year 2002.

In 1973, Mr. Mahoney joined the Northport Fire Department. In an illustrious career that spanned three decades, Mr. Mahoney has been the consummate firefighter. From the Northport Lumber Yard fire in the 1970s to the fire at the Long Island Oyster Farm, Firefighter Mahoney valiantly responded to the emergency needs of his community during times of great danger and uncertainty.

In addition, Mr. Mahoney has diligently worked to unite the Northport Fire Department with its surrounding neighborhood. His impressive accomplishments include serving as an elected captain of the rescue squad three times; chairman of the 100th anniversary committee; chairman of the fire prevention committee; coordinator of the baby-sitter course, chairman of the annual Meet Your Friend the Firefighter event; and seven-year Safety News columnist for a local newspaper, The Observer.

Mr. Mahoney has also been a valuable member of my own interview committee for military academy appointments. In addition, he has been president of the Suffolk County Volunteer Firefighters Burn Center Committee; President of the Northport Running Club; Commander of Northport American Legion Post 694; and co-chairman for the Day of Remembrance following the terrorist attacks of September 2001.

Before his career as a firefighter, Mr. Mahoney answered the call of his country, serving in the Korean War for two years. In his professional life, Jim Mahoney worked as an educator for 34 years, teaching in various elementary schools on Long Island. In addition, he was Principal of the New Lane Elementary School in Selden, NY.

Jim is a life long resident of Northport, New York, where he resides with his wife Sophie, his four children and his four grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, 2002 has been and will continue to be a banner year for Mr. Mahoney and the Northport Fire Department. A month before he was chosen as the National Volunteer Fire Council's Scott Health and Safety Volunteer Firefighter of the Year, Mr. Mahoney was presented with the Fire Service Achievement Award for the Year 2002 by the Fireman's Association of the State of New York.

Wishing him all the best as he travels first to Buffalo, New York to receive his state service award and then on to Sitka, Alaska to be presented with his national honor, I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Mr. James Mahoney.

A TRIBUTE TO JAMES "LUCKY" HAYES

HON. BENNIE G. THOMPSON

OF MISSISSIPPI

Friday, September 13, 2002

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a man by any measure—James "Lucky" Hayes. On July 31, 2002, Mr. Hayes departed us. He was a man of many talents who wore many hats including law enforcement officer, community organizer and singer/performer with the likes of Joe Henderson and the great Joe Tex.

Lucky, as his friends called him, was a believer in Proverbs 29:2 "When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice: but when the wicked beareth rule, the people mourn." Lucky worked continuously to ensure that his voice was heard in the political process by working on a number of local and statewide campaigns.

Lucky was a faithful church member. He served in the choir and on the Deacon Board. He served as a Scout Master for Boy Scouts of America, Assistant Coach for the "Chicks"

SENATE—Tuesday, September 17, 2002

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m. and was called to order by the Honorable HARRY REID, a Senator from the State of Nevada.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Lloyd John Ogilvie, offered the following prayer:

Gracious, loving God, who taught us to give thanks for all things, to dread nothing but the loss of closeness with You, and to cast all our cares on You, set us free from timidity when it comes to living the absolutes of Your commandments and speaking with the authority of Your truth. We are living in a time of moral confusion. There is a great deal of talk about values, but our society often loses its grip on Your standards. We affirm the basics of honesty, integrity, and trustworthiness. We want to be authentic people rather than professional caricatures of character. Free us from capricious dissimulations, covered duality, and covert duplicity. Instead of manipulating with power games, help us to motivate with patriotism. Grant us the passion we knew when we first heard Your call to political leadership, the idealism we had when we were driven by a cause greater than ourselves, and the inspiration we knew when Your Spirit was our only source of strength. May this be a day to recapture our first love for You and our first priority of glorifying You by serving our Nation. You are our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable HARRY REID led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

The Senator from North Dakota.

LET'S HAVE AN ECONOMIC SUMMIT

Mr. DORGAN. Madam President, several weeks ago I wrote to President Bush and suggested it is time—perhaps past the time—to have an economic summit in this country to talk about the challenges we are facing with this American economy.

It is interesting, if you look at what has happened. We had gone through a period of almost unprecedented growth and opportunity. The 1990s was a period in which people were working. We had increases in the number of jobs available, home ownership, personal income, and the stock market was moving up. The economy was growing.

It solves a lot of problems in a country when you have an economy that is growing. There is no social program that is as good as a good job that pays well, and people who are trained and skilled and able to assume those jobs.

But in recent years—the last year and a half, 2 years—we have hit some rough water here, and the economy is not doing well. We have a series of things that have happened.

Early in the President's term, he proposed a fiscal policy with a $1.7 trillion tax cut, the bulk of which goes to the upper income folks in the country. And he said: Well, we are going to have surpluses for 10 straight years.

I was on this floor and said—I am the conservative on this—I don't think you ought to predict, with any precision, what is going to happen 10 years from now. We don't know what is going to happen 3 months from now or 3 years from now, let alone 10 years from now.

The President, and others here, insisted: No. We are going to have all these surpluses, and this money belongs to the American people. Let's give it back. Let's lock it in, and do it now.

In a matter of months, we had a war on terrorism, the terrible and tragic attack on this country of September 11. We have a recession that occurs shortly after this new fiscal policy is developed, which probably was occurring even as it was being developed. And then we have a series of corporate scandals, scandals unlike any we have seen in our lifetime, certainly, and perhaps in a century or so. In addition to that, we see a stock market that begins to collapse.

So all of these things, coming together, have dramatically changed what is happening in Government. Big budget surpluses have now turned to big budget deficits. And it is as if nothing has happened. We have the administration, the President, and others acting as if: Well, nothing has really changed. There is no need to be talking about these things.

Of course there is a need for us to be talking about them. Things have changed in a dramatic way. As a result of that, I think we ought to come together and have an economic summit of some type with the President, to talk about what kind of fiscal policy can put this country's economy back on track, so that those who are out of work can find work, so that those whose life savings in their 401(k)s, that have been dissipated, can begin to see them grow once again, so that the economy produces opportunity and jobs once again.

This isn't going to happen just by accident. It is going to happen if we take a look at what is not working and what are the potential solutions to make it work.

I understand the discussion in the last few weeks has been all Iraq all the time. I am not suggesting it is not important. That is a very important matter, a serious and deadly issue for this country. It is also the case, however, as the newspaper tells us this morning, that the President is out 2 days a week campaigning across the country and fundraising and so on. He has a right to do that as well. But if he has the time to do that, then he also has the time to work with us to construct a fiscal policy that relates to what we face today.

Today we face an economy in trouble. We face a war on terror. We face budget surpluses that have turned to budget deficits. We face a stock market in great turmoil. We face a circumstance of well over 6 percent of our population out of work, unable to find jobs. It is time for us to stop, take stock, and evaluate what works and what doesn't. How do we put together a plan that moves this country toward economic opportunity and economic growth once again? I understand why some want to ignore it, but it is not the right thing for this country.

I have been chairing hearings for the last 8 or 10 months on the subject of corporate scandals. That is an important issue. It has also played a role in injuring the feelings of people and the confidence they have in the economy. There is a difference in how we view those issues.

For example, I was trying to offer an amendment to the corporate responsibility bill that passed the Senate. I was blocked by the Republican side. Regrettably, that amendment is not now law. The rest of the bill is law. The amendment is very simple. It says, if you are a corporate executive and you are taking a company into bankruptcy, the 12 months before you run that company into the ground, if you are getting bonus payments and incentive payments, we have a right to recapture them and force a disgorgement of those payments. You should not get incentives and bonuses when you run a company into the ground.

Since I was blocked from offering that and it is not now law—I will continue to try—the Financial Times came out with an analysis. They said that the 25 largest bankruptcies in America occurred in the last year and a half; 208 corporate executives took $3.3 billion in compensation out of those corporations before those corporations were run into the ground. I will hold a hearing on that in the next couple weeks.

There is something fundamentally wrong with what is going on in those areas. We have people who don't want to talk about it. The administration doesn't want to talk about it. That is not the issue they want to bring to the floor and have a debate on. But that is what we should have a debate on. How do you establish confidence in this economy if you don't clear up those kinds of problems?

So whether it is corporate scandals, a troubled economy, a recession, a war on terrorism, a stock market that acts like a yo-yo, we need to put the pieces of this puzzle together again. It is not going to get put together by people just ignoring the issue.

One of the significant issues facing our country at this moment is an economy that is in very serious trouble. It does no service to our country to deny that. Let's try to find a way to fix it. There may not be a way where one party says, we have all the answers, or the other side says, we have all the answers. Maybe the answers are the best of what both have to offer, instead of getting the worst of what each has to offer. In order to get there, you have to sit down and talk about it.

I urge the President to respond to these requests for an economic summit, to sit down with us and talk about what is wrong with the economy and how you put this back together towards an economy and a future of economic growth and opportunity once again.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois.

NATIONAL AND DOMESTIC SECURITY

Mr. DURBIN. Madam President, I thank my colleague from North Dakota for raising what I think is an important and timely issue; that is, what are we going to focus on, what will be our interest, what will be the real objective and issue we will make the centerpiece for our discussion over the next 7 weeks before the election on November 5.

It is very clear what the President wants to focus on. He wants to focus, it appears, exclusively on the issue of Iraq. Of course, we all concede that national security is our No. 1 priority. I happen to believe, as most do, that Democrats and Republicans have stood together since September 11 of 2001. We have provided the President the resources with the authority, and we have told him we will stand shoulder to shoulder with him in fighting a war on terrorism.

There is little disagreement on Saddam Hussein and Iraq. I haven't heard a single Member of Congress from either party in either Chamber stand to defend Saddam Hussein. This man is a thug. He has been a threat to his own people, to the region, and certainly, if he is developing weapons of mass destruction, then they could be a threat way beyond that region of the world.

We have to take it very seriously, as we have. I thought we made real progress last week. There was a time in early August when voices from the White House were telling us: We are just going to have to go it alone. The United States will have to take on Saddam Hussein by itself. Incidentally, we don't need congressional approval. We have father Bush's war approval which will be good enough for son Bush as President.

I disagree with that, but that was an argument being made out of the White House. There was also a suggestion that the President and the United States need not go to the United Nations to talk about inspections; that we would just, frankly, achieve regime change on our own.

Thank goodness cooler heads prevailed. Thank goodness, last week, the President not only acknowledged that he would come to Congress for any approval before we would go to war, he also went to the United Nations in New York on September 12 and made a historic speech, calling on the United Nations to live up to its responsibility, its mandate, in terms of the power and weaponry of Iraq, and basically said to the United Nations: It is time for us to prove this organization has a future.

Good news followed. This morning's paper suggests that Iraq got the message, a message delivered not just by the United Nations but by a lot of nations that historically had been at least friendly with Iraq and have now said they have no choice, they have to reopen their country to meaningful inspections. If the press reports are accurate, Saddam Hussein has said he will allow U.N. inspections on an unconditional basis now. That is a dramatic mark of progress. I hope the White House will take yes for an answer. I hope the White House will realize that we can seize a historic opportunity to send inspection teams in to find out exactly what is going on in Iraq.

If it is threatening to us, to anyone in the region, or to the people of Iraq, we have to use the authority of the United Nations to make certain that it becomes a peaceful situation. I think progress has been made. I will tip my hat to the President and to those in the White House for that fact.

But mark my words, there are some who will not take yes for an answer. They won't be satisfied that the U.N. is living up to its responsibility if it sends in inspectors. They will not be satisfied that Saddam Hussein has said: We are opening our borders. They will say: We can't trust him. It will never work. Let's prepare to invade.

That makes a mockery of the President's visit to New York last week, to the United Nations. He has called on the United Nations to act. Now it is time to give them an opportunity to act. We should respond accordingly. If it is successful, if we can bring Iraq under control through this fashion, without a war, without the loss of innocent life, then thank goodness we can consider that alternative, and we should pursue it. If not, of course, there is another day for us to consider the options that may be at our disposal.

That is the issue of national security. I have to tell you, as I travel around the State of Illinois, there are people who want to talk about other issues of security; for example, health care security.

The Presiding Officer, the Senator from Michigan, has been a leader on the issue of prescription drugs. As I go about the State of Illinois, people are interested in Iraq, but I still run into people, senior citizens in particular but ordinary families as well, who talk about the fact that they cannot afford to buy the prescriptions they need to keep themselves and their children healthy. I don't see the kind of fervor and desire coming out of the Republican side when it comes to health care security as there is for national security.

When it comes to health care security, the cost of health insurance, I went yesterday to speak to the Illinois State Chamber of Commerce. The members who were gathered there of the major corporations in Illinois agree with the major unions in Illinois that the cost of health insurance is bankrupting our system. Businesses cannot afford to buy insurance for the owners of the business, let alone for the employees. The premiums go up 25, 35 percent a year. Labor unions are seeing every increasing dollar amount on an hourly basis eaten up completely by the cost of health insurance increases.

Have we heard a word from this administration about health care security, about the cost of health insurance? Of course not.

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DURBIN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. REID. I also heard the Senator from North Dakota speak this morning. It appears that I am hearing the fact that we can talk about Iraq and, at the same time, we can deal with some of these economic issues with this staggering economy. Is that what the Senator is saying?

Mr. DURBIN. That is exactly right. I say this to the people at the White House who make up the schedule: Can you give us 4 hours a week on the economy? Pick the 4 hours and let's talk about it in realistic terms. Let's talk about health security 1 hour a week. Can we do that? Can the White House find time in the busy schedule of dealing with national security and making campaign trips to raise money for candidates to give us 1 hour a week to talk about health care? I don't think that is too much to ask. And I think Congress ought to reciprocate. We ought to be answering in terms of what we can do to try to lift the burden, whether it is the cost of prescription drugs or the cost of health insurance for businesses and families across America.

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. DURBIN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. REID. The Senator served in the House of Representatives. Is the Senator aware that this administration—a Republican administration—has significant control and direction that it can give to the House of Representatives, which is led by the Republicans?

Mr. DURBIN. Absolutely. The Speaker of the House almost has unilateral power to set the business for the House, now controlled by the President's party.

Mr. REID. Would the Senator acknowledge that the House basically has been doing nothing? We have appropriations bills that we are waiting for them to do. I have not heard the President say one word about the inaction of the House. Has the Senator?

Mr. DURBIN. I have not. The Senator is aware of the fact that we have the Patients' Bill of Rights that has gone nowhere in conference with the House and Senate, and there are issues we have tried to raise time and again—energy, for example—and all of these things have died in conference.

Mr. REID. Would the Senator also acknowledge that this bill, which is very important to constituencies all over America, on terrorism insurance—and the President went to Pennsylvania a couple weeks ago and said: I am for hardhats, not for trial lawyers. Does the Senator realize that is lost because the Republican House will not let us even hold a meeting on this bill?

Mr. DURBIN. I am aware of that. I say to the Senator from Nevada that I heard from not only businesses and developers and unions but from ordinary people about terrorism insurance. There is a fear—legitimate fear—if we don't pass something soon, it is going to have a dramatic negative impact on employment.

We are already losing jobs. That is another issue the White House won't discuss. I have talked about national security and health care security. There is an income security thing, as well—not only the loss of jobs in this country but terrorism insurance plays right into this. What is the President doing? What is Congress doing? Can the President give us 1 hour a week on the economy, 1 hour a week on income security, to talk about what we can do to increase the number of jobs? A meeting in Waco, TX, in August for a day is not enough. It takes a bipartisan, honest effort and to engage the Congress in doing something. Let's pass the terrorism bill. Let's have the President call on Democrats and Republicans to get it done this week. We should do it this week. If we do not, we are not meeting our responsibility.

Mr. REID. If the Senator will further yield, the Senator is aware that the newspapers in Washington indicate that the President has been in Iowa, over the period of a year, I think 11 times. The Senator is aware that Iowa is where the first primary is held. The Senator from Illinois is aware that Iowa is where there are close elections.

I would like the Senator to respond, isn't it necessary that the President be more engaged in what is going on in domestic issues rather than politicking around the country?

Mr. DURBIN. That is the very point I am making. I concede that the President is the leader of his party, and every President has spent time trying to help his party and its candidates. I don't begrudge any President doing that as we come close to an election. As I travel in my State, the people are more focused on the problems that families are running into when it comes to the basic necessities of life than on the next election. They are hoping this President and all candidates will address issues as basic as income security, health care security, and, may I add, pension security.

This is something that has become a devastating issue for families in Illinois. Former steelworkers worked a lifetime and paid in religiously, week after week, month after month, year after year, with the promise that when they retired, they would have a pension and health care. They now find themselves high and dry with bankrupt companies. I haven't heard a word from the administration about pension security. This really hits a lot of people close to home.

I grew up in an area in Illinois that had a lot of steel mills. I used to apply there for jobs in the summer and hope that I could get one of those great-paying jobs. I have gone to meet with displaced steelworkers. I see tough men, muscular people, who worked hard their whole lives, who just don't take much foolishness at all, break down and cry in front of me because at age 59 they have lost all their health insurance protection. These are retirees who really followed the rules and did what they were supposed to do in America. Can we ask the President for 1 hour a week to talk about pension security—Just 1 hour? I think that would be an indication the President is listening to the people across America in terms of the economic issues.

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DURBIN. Yes.

Mr. REID. It has been discussed on the floor that we have held up in the other body, which has the ability to move very quickly, terrorism insurance, Patients' Bill of Rights, election reform, energy policies for this country, bankruptcy reform. So we know things are held up there.

Now, I say to my friend from Illinois, I am kind of a hawk. I was the first Democrat to support President Bush when he wanted to go into Iraq the first time. I consider myself a hawk rather than a dove. I am looking very closely at Iraq and I think we need to do that. But in doing that, is the Senator aware that Lawrence Lindsey, the President's chief economic adviser, indicated in the Wall Street Journal yesterday that the war in Iraq will cost this country about $200 billion? Is the Senator also aware that I had a conversation with the chief executive officers of the airlines last Thursday in my office? The first thing the spokesperson, the chief executive officer of one of the largest airlines in the world, told me was: If there is a war in Iraq, we all go broke.

That was told to me in my office last week: If there is a war in Iraq, we all go broke, all the major airlines in America.

So the Senator is aware we not only need to focus on Iraq—the military aspects of it—but also what it does to the domestic policy, which the President is ignoring. Is the Senator aware we need to also consider that?

Mr. DURBIN. That is a very important point, not to mention the most basic concern, of course. If we go to war, lives of Americans will be lost. Innocent people will die. War should be the last decision we make, the last option we take. Thank goodness, we now have movement through the United Nations. I am asking that the President and the White House, now that progress is being made, spend some small portion of their time focusing on the economic issues the Senator from Nevada raises. I have talked about health care security, income security, pension security. I will add a fourth one—Social Security.

We realize the President's tax package of last year is going to take $2 trillion out of the Social Security trust fund over the next 10 years—$2 trillion—with no promise to repay any of it at a time when the baby boomers, by the millions, will start arriving and asking for Social Security. Social Security is our contract with America—our real contract—the one that comes from the heart. We have had it since the days of Franklin Roosevelt. Is it too much to ask this administration to give us an hour a week to focus on Social Security and its future, and Medicare, talk about the reimbursement for health care for senior citizens and hospitals and providers across America? These are real issues. I certainly have hospitals in rural areas and hospitals in the inner city struggling to survive at this point in time.

When you talk about the issues on which we should be focusing, national security is important, and I think it ought to be No. 1 on the agenda; but, for goodness' sake, don't ignore the rest of America and the lives we have to lead and the impact that our failure to act is going to have. That is why I look at 7 weeks before the next election and say to the President and the White House: Give us an hour a week at least to talk about the economy in this country, about the need to breathe life back into this economy.

It is only 2 years ago we were doing so well. We had all of this accumulation of wealth. People saw their retirement plans growing. They were making plans to leave their jobs early and enjoy a comfortable life with their families.

People were seeing their stock portfolios improving to the point where they were considering options. They knew they had money to send their kids to college. Now look what we are up against, and not a word from the White House. One little meeting in Waco, TX, does not make economic policy for America.

Where is this administration? Where is this President? Where is the economic leadership this country needs?

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. DURBIN. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. REID. Las Vegas, Clark County, has the sixth largest school district in America. About 250,000 students go to school in the Las Vegas area in one school district. Chicago, I am sure, is larger than that; is that not true?

(Mr. CARPER assumed the Chair.)

Mr. DURBIN. That is true.

Mr. REID. Has the Senator heard coming from the White House during the past 2 months, 3 months, a single word about education?

Mr. DURBIN. No, I have not. I say to the Senator from Nevada, he joined me and Democrats and Republicans in passing the No Child Left Behind legislation the President asked for to put more resources in education. The Senator from Nevada is just as aware as I am that when the President's budget came up, he did not fund his own programs. He did not put the money into the schools as he promised.

As I go across my State—and I bet the State of Nevada is in the same situation—we have seen a downturn in State revenues, cutbacks in State budgets, schools are suffering. They are saying: Where is that Federal money President Bush promised us? It is not there, and this administration does not want to talk about that. They do not want to talk about education security for this country. They want to talk only about national security. They do not want to talk about income security, pension security, health care security, Social Security, or doing something to make our schools more secure.

One has to ask oneself: Is that as good as it gets? Is that the best we can hope for from this White House, to focus exclusively on Iraq and the Middle East? I think it is a mistake.

We have made progress. I tip my hat to the President. Let's use the United Nations. Let's bring Saddam Hussein under control, but for goodness' sake, let's get our economy under control, too. It is really out of hand. People across the country—families, small businesses, family farmers—are suffering as a result.

Ms. STABENOW. Will my friend from Illinois yield?

Mr. DURBIN. I will be happy to yield.

Ms. STABENOW. Having had the opportunity to preside and listen to the discussion, I thank him for putting into perspective what our challenge is, not only on the national security front; I thank him for focusing on the fact we are together and stand for safety and security, but also the fact we need to be focused on our economic security as well.

Mr. President, I wonder, also, if the Senator might add to his list—I know he is aware of the fact we have passed a very important prescription drug bill. We had two focuses in the Senate: One, to add Medicare coverage and, two, to lower prices for everyone.

The point the Senator from Illinois made this morning about the high price of health care for businesses, for our farmers, for everybody is also very much a part of what we passed to lower prices by getting more competition with generic drugs, opening the border to Canada to bring lower prices, giving States more flexibility.

I wonder if the Senator will comment on the fact that the Senate has passed this very important bill, sent it to the House, and it has received no action this fall. We have nothing yet in committee. We have not seen the President speaking out about the fact we passed a bill that will actually lower prices, bring more competition, address the fact that our seniors and our families are having to struggle right now—in fact, right now, as we are here, there are people who are watching C-SPAN 2 saying: Do I eat today or buy my medicine?

We had a bill which passed the Senate. We would greatly appreciate the President's leadership in encouraging the House of Representatives to pass this bill this fall. We could dramatically lower prices immediately with the passage of that bill.

Mr. DURBIN. I say to the Senator from Michigan, first, let me acknowledge—and I am sure my colleagues know as well—Senator STABENOW has been a leader on the issue of prescription drugs. She has been tenacious. Thank goodness she has been. She took a bus trip to Canada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the majority leader has expired. Twenty-eight minutes remain on the other side.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that until someone comes from the other side, we be allowed to use that time. The minute someone's head pops in that door, we will quit. In the meantime, there seems to be no need to have the Senate voiceless.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the Chair. I thank the Senator from Nevada.

The point the Senator from Michigan makes is an important one. We did pass a prescription drug bill. It was not what we wanted. We wanted a voluntary program under Medicare which would be universal and available for all Americans so they could get the benefits of Medicare when it came to prescription drugs.

We could not convince our Republican friends to go along with us on that, but we did pass a bill in terms of generic drugs to reduce costs for all families across America, to let States come up with their own plans so they could find ways to reduce costs for all the citizens in their State, as well as the safe reimportation of drugs from countries that have much lower costs. Those are three good issues, but do not forget the fourth.

Senator ROCKEFELLER's amendment provides that $6 billion, on an emergency basis, will be given for Medicaid to States facing high unemployment. These States have cut back in reimbursements to providers and hospitals. My State is one of them—I bet the State of Michigan is too—and that $6 billion would come back to the States right now. It would help them keep hospitals open and provide basic health care.

We cannot get the House of Representatives to consider that legislation. Now they are talking about dropping everything and coming up with a resolution on Iraq. Why is it they can drop everything for a resolution on Iraq, but cannot drop everything, when it comes to prescription drugs, to move the issue forward?

Our bill is there. It is pending. It would be a help to all families across America, not just the families of senior citizens.

I say to the Senator from Michigan, we have to keep reminding the President and the Republican leadership that there are many issues in this country, not the least of which is good quality health care for everyone.

Ms. STABENOW. Absolutely.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, before the Senator yields, may I ask one more question?

Mr. DURBIN. Of course.

Mr. REID. What the Senator said is we can focus on Iraq and that there are many issues the President can help us on: Getting appropriations bills passed in the House would help us; doing something on election reform—we had another debacle in Florida 2 years after the original debacle; we passed a bill and are waiting to get that out of conference. We have the energy bill we need to get out of conference with the House. There is terrorism insurance, bankruptcy—am I missing anything?—generic drugs. That is one issue about which the Senator from Illinois and I did not talk.

Mr. DURBIN. Patients' Bill of Rights.

Mr. REID. Patients' Bill of Rights. There are so many issues with which we need to deal in the Congress that the President can help us with if we were not on the one track of Iraq.

It seems to me—and one can read about this in the editorial pages every day—that the President could be doing this to divert attention from these domestic issues. Has the Senator read some of those comments, I say to my friend from Illinois?

Mr. DURBIN. I have read the speculation. I do not buy it. I do not believe it, but the point I am trying to make in the course of this—and I think we all are—is that the President has made progress. The United Nations is moving forward. Inspections are going to be ordered. Saddam Hussein has agreed to them. That is real progress. I salute the President for that progress.

What I am now saying is, let's focus on America and some of the things we need to do to win the economic war in this country. I am asking for a very small pledge of time from the White House to focus on these economic issues that face our country. We can do both. The United States can defend itself, fight a war on terrorism, keep a watchful eye on Iraq and still be worried about the issues that American families in Nevada, Illinois, and Delaware think about every day: What about my job? What about my pension? How am I going to pay for that health insurance? Can we pay for these prescription drugs? Is Social Security really in good shape for years to come?

These are real gut-wrenching issues for real families. I think it is a responsibility of the White House to get beyond the agenda they have focused on for the last several weeks and open it up to new issues and new concerns that are universal across America.

We talked about education. Kids are back in school, and there is a lot of concern about whether our schools have the quality teachers they need, whether the kids are going to get the education they deserve. We have to put money back in education. We have to focus on making certain we have after-school programs for kids who need a special helping hand, smaller class sizes—something we pushed for in the past—make sure teachers are paid as the professionals they are. These are real needs.

When we talk about filling real needs, I do not want to overlook in health care a shortage in nursing. I would like the White House to give us 15 minutes this week or next week with an idea for the agenda of having more nurses in America. This is a serious shortcoming in health care in the United States. Hospitals have reduced their number of beds; nursing and convalescent homes, the same, for one simple reason: There are not enough nurses.

We need an initiative, a national leadership. I hope the President will not ignore this. When you listen to the agenda we could be considering, it is substantial, but it gets to the heart of the real issues about which Americans are concerned. I sincerely hope we move on that and move on it quickly. We owe it to the American people.

I yield the floor.

Mr. REID. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DOING THE SENATE'S WORK

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I know Senators are just getting back into town from the Jewish holiday yesterday. And I hope we can make the most of this week. We have a lot to do, on the Interior appropriations bill as well as on the issue of homeland security.

As our colleagues are aware, this afternoon we will have a cloture vote on the Byrd amendment. I reluctantly filed that cloture vote last week because we are now in the third week of debate on the Interior appropriations bill as well as on homeland security.

With all of the work that must be done and with all of the issues we must address, we simply cannot prolong this debate indefinitely.

Seventy-nine Senators a couple of weeks ago voted for an amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Montana, myself, and others responding to the crisis we now face in drought-stricken parts of the country. The regions of the country which are experiencing drought are growing—the Southeast, the Midwest, and the far West—areas throughout the country that have experienced drought conditions, and in some cases it is unprecedented.

We also have a very serious situation with regard to firefighting, so serious that this administration changed its position from one which said we will not provide any new resources for firefighting—that all firefighting moneys that ought to be dedicated to firefighting this fall be taken from the Forest Service budget. They changed from that position to say, we now recognize how serious this situation is, and we will commit $850 million and ask the Congress to support it.

You have two very important priorities in dealing with disaster and crisis: One with the Forest Service and firefighting needs. This is urgent. This is extraordinarily important to the ongoing effort to fight fires throughout the country, especially again in the West. And, second, as I noted, the drought.

We have voted for this legislation. We have gone on record on a bipartisan basis in support of this legislation. I know there are those who still would like to work out other compromises relating to other issues, and if that can be done, I certainly will welcome it.

But we simply cannot go on week after week after week without more notable progress, without more of a tangible way with which to address these needs, and, secondly, without a way to recognize that we have a lot of work to do in a very short period of time. We have what amounts to about 15 legislative days left prior to the time we adjourn for the year. I am troubled, to say the least, by the extraordinary list of items that have to be addressed and the very minimal amount of time legislatively we have to address them.

I come to the floor this morning urging colleagues on both sides of the aisle to recognize the need, to recognize the urgency, to recognize the shortness of legislative time available, and to recognize how important it is that we move on to accomplish as much as we possibly can in a very short period of time.

I can only hope we will get a good vote this afternoon—I would like it to be unanimous—on cloture, so at least on this particular amendment we have the opportunity to move on to other issues, and hopefully to a time for final passage on the Interior appropriations bill.

I will have more to say about homeland security later on in the day, but I must say, this is something that just begs our support, recognizing the prioritization it deserves as we consider the schedule and the need that is so clearly a recognition around the country.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, the majority leader makes a very good point. I am struck by what we are debating off the floor, which is timber health. At the heart of that is how we deal with judicial appeals, which has brought a new dynamic to that debate on forest health and how we manage our public lands; that is, not a denial of judicial appeals, but also in the area of timber restraining orders.

People can file appeals—we do not want to deny that—but also how we deal with the decision-rendering process, which does cause some concern with folks using timber restraining orders as a tool in the process to get their way. Basically, that is what we have here.

We are on a time line, if we go off this. Those who do not want to see anything move press us into a time line, and then we go on home knowing there is a timeframe on that debate.

Given the time we have and the leader's decision to double-track these two issues in order to facilitate and deal with these issues in a short time line, we have to take a look at that. I know the leader is. I congratulate him for his push on this and to make it a reality. But so far, it hasn't come to be and does not get us to where I think we want to be before we go home in October. We want to move forward as fast as we can.

But also there is lingering debate out there that a lot of folks are concerned about—especially on our forests. I want to bolster the leader's contention that drought relief and disaster relief in farm and ranch country are still with us. Just on Sunday past—here we are in the middle of September with football in the air—it was 92 degrees in Billings, MT. The Yellowstone River is as low as I have ever seen it. Above the Bighorn River where it spills into the Yellowstone, you can walk across that river just about anywhere and not get your knees wet. We still have that concern.

The leader is right. It passed this body overwhelmingly. It should be allowed to move forward with the apparatus in front of us in which to get that relief out to our people who are suffering at this time. I appreciate his leadership on that.

I yield the floor.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 2003

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 5093, which the clerk will report by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5093) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 2003, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Byrd amendment No. 4472, in the nature of a substitute.

Byrd amendment No. 4480 (to amendment No. 4472), to provide funds to repay accounts from which funds were borrowed for emergency wildfire suppression.

Craig/Domenici amendment No. 4518 (to amendment No. 4480), to reduce hazardous fuels on our national forests.

Dodd amendment No. 4522 (to amendment No. 4472), to prohibit the expenditure of funds to recognize Indian tribes and tribal nations until the date of implementation of certain administrative procedures.

Byrd/Stevens amendment No. 4532 (to amendment No. 4472), to provide for critical emergency supplemental appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I would like to speak directly to the issues raised both by the majority leader and the Senator from Montana; specifically, with respect to how we are going to resolve issues related to the health of our forests.

I know the discussion has greatly focused on fires and the catastrophic results of fires this year. I am going to talk about that to a great extent. But I would like to make a point at the very beginning which I hope we don't lose sight of; that is, fire is merely one component of the problem we have to deal with. What we are really talking about is the health of our forests, both for the protection of people from catastrophic wildfires and also for the ecological benefits that a healthy forest provides. It provides wonderful recreation for our citizens. It provides habitat for all of the flora and fauna we not only like to visit and like to see but to understand that it is very important for ecological balance in our country. It protects endangered species. It provides a home for all of the other fish, insects, birds, mammals, and reptiles we would like to protect, whether they are endangered or not.

In order to have this kind of healthy forest, we have come to a conclusion, I think pretty much unanimously in this country, that we are going to have to manage the forest differently than we have in the past.

What the debate is all about is how the Congress is going to respond to this emergency, not just from the catastrophic wildfires but from the other devastation of our forests that has created such an unhealthy condition that it literally threatens the health of probably somewhere between 30 and 70 million acres of forest land in the United States.

The administration has come forth with a far-reaching proposal that will begin to enable us to treat these forests in a sensible way. We have legislation pending before us—an amendment by the Senator from Idaho—that was put in place as a means of being able to discuss this. And we have been trying, over the course of the last week or so, to negotiate among ourselves in the Senate to be able to come to some conclusion about what amendment it might be possible to adopt as part of the Interior appropriations bill so that it will be easier for us to go in and manage these forests.

I am sad to say that so far our efforts at negotiation have not borne fruit. I think, therefore, it is necessary today to begin to recognize that unless we are able to reach agreement pretty soon, we are going to have to press forward with the kind of management approach that I believe will enable us to create healthy forests again.

Let me go back over some of the ground that has been discussed but perhaps put a little different face on it in talking about my own State of Arizona.

Some people may not think of the State of Arizona as containing forests. They may think of it as a desert State. The reality is, a great deal of my State is covered with some of the most beautiful forests in the entire United States—the entire world, for that matter. We have the largest Ponderosa pine forest in the United States. Ponderosa pines are enormous, beautiful trees, with yellowing bark. It is not uncommon at all for them to have a girth of 24 inches and above in a healthy forest. They are a little bit like if you want to think of the sequoia trees in California—not quite as big but coming close to that kind of magnificent tree.

One hundred years ago, the ponderosa pine forests in Arizona were healthy. These trees were huge. They were beautiful. There were not very many per acre; and that, frankly, was what enabled them to grow so well. They were not competing with a lot of small underbrush or small trees for the nutrients in the soil, the Sun, the water, which is relatively scarce in Arizona, and they grew to magnificent heights.

Several things happened to begin to change the circumstances. First of all, loggers came in and, seeing an opportunity, cut a lot of these magnificent trees. Secondly, grazing came in, and all of the grasses that grew because of the meadow-like conditions in which this forest existed were nibbled right down to the base in some cases. A lot of small trees, therefore, began to crop up and crowd out the grasses, and pretty soon there was not any grass. There was simply a dense undergrowth of little trees that began to crowd out what was left of the bigger trees, as well.

Then came the fires because these little trees were so prone to burning. It is a dry climate. They are crowded together. Instead of having maybe 200 trees per acre, for example, you might have 2,000 trees per acre or more. But they are all little, tiny diameter trees that are very susceptible to fire. And the big trees that are left, of course, are susceptible to fire as well because when the lightning strikes, it sets the small trees on fire, which then quickly crown up to the larger trees, creating a ladder effect, going right on up to the top of the very biggest trees. It explodes in fire, as you have seen on television. That kind of environment is what we are faced with today.

The old growth has come back. We have some magnificent, big trees, but they are being crowded out by all of these very small-diameter trees and other brush and other fuel that has accumulated on the forest floor. So what happens when there is a fire—whether man set or lightning created—is that the fuel begins to burn. It burns quickly just like a Christmas tree, if you can imagine, if you have ever seen a Christmas tree burn. It quickly burns the smaller trees and underbrush, and then catches the branches, the lower branches of the bigger trees, and then crowns out, and then you have a big fire.

What is the result of the big fires in Arizona this year?

First of all, we can talk about the size of the fires. We can talk about the size of the Rodeo-Chediski fire in Arizona. It was about 60 percent the size of Rhode Island. This is simply one fire. You can see from this map the size of the Rodeo-Chediski fire. Here is the size of the State of Rhode Island. If you add in other fires that have occurred in Arizona this year, you have a size that exceeds the size of Rhode Island. That is in my State. That is how much has burned in my State—about 622,000 acres in this fire alone.

Let me show you what it looks like after that burn. And I have been there. I have walked it. I have driven through it. I have seen it from the air by helicopter. It is a devastating sight. Here it is, as shown in this photograph.

The ground is gray. It burned so hot that it created a silicone-like glaze over the soil. And, of course, it just absolutely takes all the pine needles and branches off the trees, so all you have are these sticks left standing. Some of these, by the way, are pretty good size trees. And there is salvageable timber in here if we are permitted to go in and do that salvaging.

But because of the glaze over the soil, the report from the experts in the field is that when the rains finally began to come, it did not soak into the soil; it ran off. And what you now find throughout the central and eastern part of Arizona is massive mud flow into the streams. It kills the fish. It makes the water unpalatable. It devastates the free flow of the water, so it creates new channels and erodes the soil. It goes around bridges, and there is one bridge that was very much in danger.

It flows into the largest lake in the State, Lake Roosevelt. And Roosevelt Lake is the biggest surface water source of water for the city of Phoenix and the other valley cities. There has been great concern that mud flow will affect the water quality and the water taste, as well as damaging the environment for the aquatic life in the lake and in the other streams.

There are some other sad things about this fire. Just to mention some of the devastation, the total of this fire was about 468,000 acres burned. The total in Arizona is about 622,000 acres. The structures burned in Arizona were about 423, the majority of which were homes and some commercial structures.

In the United States, this year alone, we have lost 21 lives as a result of the wildfires, and over 3,000 structures. The impacts on our forests in Arizona, the old growth trees will take 300 to 400 years to regenerate—300 to 400 years. To have a tree of any good size takes at least 100, 150 years.

We have endangered species in our forests, the Mexican spotted owl, for example. The fire burned through 20 of their protected active centers. So I think those who claim to be environmentalists, who want to protect a forest by keeping everybody out of it, and rendering it subject to this kind of wildfire have a lot of explaining to do when 20 of these protected centers for the Mexican spotted owls were ruined, devastated, burned up in this fire. The recovery time for this habitat is 300 to 400 years as well.

Twenty-five goshawk areas—this is another one of our protected species—and postfledging areas were impacted or destroyed. Wildlife mortalities—and these are just those that were actually documented—46 elk, 2 bears, and 1 bear cub, and, of course, countless other small critters.

I think it is interesting that air quality is something that is frequently overlooked when you think of these fires. I was up there. I know because I had to breathe it. But just one interesting statistic is that the greenhouse gases from the Rodeo fire emitted during 1 day—just 1 day of the fire; and this thing burned for 2 to 3 weeks in a big way, and then longer than that in a smaller way—but 1 day's emissions of greenhouse gases from the Rodeo fire surpassed all of the carbon dioxide emissions of all passenger cars operating in the United States on that same day.

So if we are really concerned about greenhouse gases, just stop and think, all of the emissions from all of the cars in the United States did not equal 1 day's worth of emissions from this one fire. Of course, there were a lot of other fires burning in the country as well.

Let me try to put this in perspective in terms of the amount of area of Arizona that is subject to this kind of fire.

We have about 4 million acres of forest in Arizona that is classified as condition 3. That is about one-third of all the forests in Arizona. Condition 3 is the area that is in the most danger of catastrophic wildfire. Here is a State map of Arizona. And the area in yellow is pretty much the forested area of our State, with the area depicted in red the class 3 area.

So you can see that a great deal of our ponderosa pine forest here is in very dire condition and needs to be treated as soon as possible.

The Grand Canyon is right here. You can see on the north rim, there are significant areas that need to be treated. Over here, near the Navaho Indian Reservation, there are areas that need to be treated. Flagstaff is here; you can see the mountains that rise over 12,000 feet just north of Flagstaff. Those areas are very much in danger. You have the Prescott National Forest, Coconino National Forest, the Tonto National Forest. The Apache Indian Reservation is probably the largest. This area is the watershed for Phoenix, the Gila River and its tributaries. It provides a great deal of the surface water for the city of Phoenix and surrounding areas.

These are beautiful mountain areas with a base elevation of over 7,000 feet. This area over here is 9,000 feet. The mountains rise over 11,000 feet, covered with ponderosa pines, spruce, fir, aspen, and others trees. All of this area is in grave danger of beetle kill disease, mistletoe, wildfire, and being weakened and dying from insufficient nutrients and water because of the condition of the forest.

It is a very matted, tightly packed forest with all of the little diameter trees literally squeezing out the big trees that we all want to save. It is called a dog hair thicket. It is so thick that a dog can't even run through it without leaving some of his hair behind.

Let me show you an example of what the forest used to look like and how it looks today. On the top you see a photograph of 1909. You can see these beautiful big ponderosa pine trees. There are some smaller ones back here. You have different age growths, and that is the way you like to have a forest so as the big ones grow older and die, there are others to take their place. You see a great deal of grass, sunshine, open space. You can imagine this is a very healthy forest because you don't have too much competition for what the trees need to grow. It is also a wonderful environment for elk and deer and butterflies and birds. It is open. You have plenty of grass for forage and so on.

This is the same area in the year 1992. This is the way much of our forests look today—absolutely dense, crowded. I am not sure if the chart is observable here, but you can see that the forest is now very crowded. Here you have beautiful, large ponderosa pines, a couple more back here, but they are being squeezed out by all of the smaller diameter trees.

What we are talking about in management is not cutting the big trees, not logging the forest. We are talking about taking out the bulk of these smaller diameter trees that are not doing anybody or anything any good and are clogging up the forests, preventing the grass from growing. They are ruining the habitat for other animals and creating conditions for insects, disease, and catastrophic wildfire.

For those who say we don't want to go back to logging, nobody is talking about that. We are talking about saving these big trees, not cutting them down.

The problem is, a lot of the environmental community is in total concert with this general management. But you have a very loud, activist, radical minority that is so afraid commercial businesses will want to cut large trees, that they want to destroy any commercial industry. In the State of Arizona, there is essentially no logging industry left. We have two very small mills, and the Apache Indian Reservation has two mills. The Apache Reservation I will get to in a moment because that is where the Rodeo-Chediski fire occurred.

What we are talking about here is having well-designed projects, after consultation with all of the so-called stakeholders, with the Forest Service having gone through all of the environmental planning and designating projects, stewardship projects with enhanced value so that they can go to these commercial businesses and say: Can you go into this forest and clean all of this out and make it look like this? Whatever you take out of here that we mark for you to be able to take out, you can sell that. You can turn it into chipboard, fiberboard. You can turn it into biodegradable products for burning and creating electricity. You can perhaps take some of the medium-size trees and get some boards out of them, maybe some two-by-fours. Can you make enough of a profit to do this for us because there is not enough money for us to appropriate to treat 30 or 40 or 50 million acres?

We are talking about a lot of money we simply don't have. You have to rely upon the commercial businesses to do that. Some of the radicals are so concerned that when they are doing this job for us, they will say: We don't have anything more to do; we want to take the big trees. And they are concerned that we won't have the ability to tell them no. Therefore, they are going to prevent us from cleaning up the forest for making it healthy again. They will create a condition that results in the catastrophic wildfires I was talking about; in effect, cutting off our nose to spite our face.

We are not going to do what everybody recognizes needs to be done because maybe when that is all done, 40 years from now, somebody will say: We want to go after the big trees.

Does anybody believe the political environment in that setting is going to permit us to do that? None of us are going to agree to that. I don't agree to it today.

Let me tell you a story. Former Secretary of Interior Bruce Babbitt is a very strong supporter of what we are talking about. An area he used to hike in when he was young is called the Mt. Trumbull area on the north rim of the Grand Canyon north of Flagstaff. As Secretary of Interior, being BLM land under the jurisdiction of the Department of Interior, he was able to do the rules and regulations that enabled us to go in and do the clearing. So they hired a couple of brothers that had a small business. They brought some pieces of equipment down from Oregon. One of them was a very small caterpillar thing that could snip all these small diameter trees. They cleaned out a fairly good size area. They made enough money to be in business, and isn't that fine. What they left was a forest that looked more like this.

I remember one tree that a BLM person there said: I have to show you this. Here was a tree that looked like a big California sequoia. It was a big ponderosa pine. The boughs came all the way down to the ground. And all around it were these small dog hair thicket kind of trees and brush. He said: We have to get them to clean this out because this tree is very much in danger of burning. If any spark comes within a mile or so, it will just climb up this ladder.

That beautiful tree, that was maybe 200 or 300, 400 years old, is going to go up in flames. That is the kind of tree we are trying to protect. For those who say we want to somehow do logging and so on, I simply say they are wrong; we are not. This is what we are trying to create, not this.

Let's go on to talk about some of the other aspects. In Arizona, there were about 4 million acres classified as condition 3, meaning most subject to catastrophic wildfire. Nationally, there are just under 75 million such class 3 acres.

Out of this, the Forest Service identifies about 24 million as the highest risk of catastrophic fires. And this definition means they are so degraded that they require mechanical thinning before fire can be safely reintroduced.

According to the General Accounting Office, we have a very short period of time in which to treat these acres. According to a 1999 study, the GAO says we have 10 to 25 years to treat this 30 plus million acres of class 3 land if we are to prevent unstoppable fires.

This shows you what can be done when you treat the acres. This is full restoration, meaning we have gone in and cut out quite a few of the small diameter trees leaving relatively few, mostly larger trees per acre. This is exactly what this particular acre had on it when the cutting and thinning had been done, going in and cutting out the small diameter trees.

In Arizona you can introduce fire in prescribed burns during the month of October and November because it is cooler. It is moist, and the fires are not going to get out of control. Fire was introduced here in this area in October, the wet month, and you can see that it is burning along the ground, burning the fuel that has accumulated on the ground. It is not going to go through this tree here or these trees here. It may burn some of the smaller trees, but what is going to be left is a nice environment in which you have grasses that can crop up the next spring and reintroduce a lot of species and habit and protect, as well, from fire.

If lightning were to strike one of these trees and start a fire, it would return along the ground like this. In the hot summer months, once it has been treated, it is likely, with all of the fuel having burned off the previous winter, the fire will move around the ground and it will not crown out to a higher degree of fire.

The reason you cannot treat these forests with fire alone, and you have to mechanically thin and cut out some of the underbrush first, is demonstrated by the next chart. This shows you what happened when we left this many trees per acre. This shows you when you do minimal thinning. They didn't do very much thinning, and they reintroduced fire, and you can see this fire is starting to climb the trunks of these trees and is going to crown out. You see it coming up along the top of this tree. It is going to catch the crowns of a lot of these larger trees. They are at great risk of burning and a fire starting. This is during the wet month of October when you have a lot of moisture. If you don't take out very many trees, a la this particular treatment here, minimal thinning, and you introduce fire, you are going to have a risk of fire in the hot months. It is going to be a very grave risk.

Let's turn to the third chart, which shows what happens when you don't do anything at all, you only burn. This demonstrates why you have to do thinning first. No thinning was done on this particular acre. This is during the cool, wet month of October in Arizona. They introduced fire, and look at what happened. It got out of control and created a crown fire. This is the beginning of what the Rodeo-Chediski fire looked like.

So it is too late in much of our forests to introduce prescribed burning. It will go out of control. You have to go in, as I said, and thin it out first and then, that fall, you set a prescribed burn and you burn all of the fuel on the ground. Thereafter, the grasses grow and everything regenerates and you have a very nice environment.

There is another myth. I talked about cutting old-growth trees. When people talk about saving old growth, we need to be careful because the reality is that a lot of old-growth trees, particularly in Arizona, are not big trees at all. They are not the ones you necessarily want to save. If you have been on the California coast, perhaps you have seen trees over a thousand years old. Some of the oldest ones are gnarled.

Which tree here is the oldest? Interestingly, this smaller tree is 60 years old and this bigger one is 55 years old. This is the younger tree—the big one. This tree was in an area that wasn't competing for a lot of nutrients, water, and sun. It was in a more open area. It grew as you would expect it to—very well, very quickly, and very big.

Obviously, this is a tree we are going to want to preserve. It will get bigger and bigger. But if you have that area in which the trees are crowded together in these very dense thickets, you can have a tree no bigger than this small one after 60 years. In fact, I have another one about the same size that is 88 years old.

Old growth would be something over 120 to 150 years. We have trees not much bigger than this that are designated old growth. We desire to create an environment in which you get these big beautiful trees that grow old and big and create the habitat for all of the fauna I discussed before for which we are trying to preserve the forests. This is an illustration of why you don't want to have arbitrary limits on cutting old-growth trees. The tree you want to save is this big one, not that one, the small one. That makes a much nicer environment and one that is better for the wildlife.

(Mrs. CLINTON assumed the Chair.)

Mr. KYL. Let me now discuss one of the concerns that has cropped up during the discussions about the kind of legislation we want.

There are those organizations in the environmental movement that understand there is too much public opinion in favor of doing something to manage our forests now because of this wildfire season, this catastrophic fire season. They understand they have to make some concessions. They have concluded that the best thing to be for is what they call urban/wild interface management. What that is supposed to mean is that you can go in and thin the areas right around communities and right around people's expensive million-dollar summer homes, and the like, but you cannot go out into the forests themselves.

We will put up the chart that shows the class 3 lands.

The problem is, first of all, it treats very few acres. This will illustrate the point. We don't have very many communities in these forests. There are five or six little towns in this whole area here. To do urban/wild interface management alone, by going out a half mile around the city limits of those little towns, is going to do nothing to enhance the environment in the rest of the forest. It will do nothing to protect the habitat of the endangered species out there. Actually, it does very little to protect the communities themselves.

The Rodeo-Chediski fire—and I will show you the chart later—burned with such ferocity and intensity that the small areas that had been treated provided little or no protection. It was only the areas where there had been a larger area of treatment that were protected as a result of the fire.

I can tell you, while the fire was still burning in the eastern area, we helicoptered up to the Rodeo-Chediski lookout and we drove about another 2 miles on a road that divided between an area that had been treated—that is to say, there had been thinning, and I believe prescribed burning in the area as well, and on the other side of the road it was not treated. The side that was not treated looked like a moonscape. There was no living thing. Every tree had all of the branches and pine needles burned off—nothing but ghostly, ghastly sticks. On the side that was treated, you could hardly see that a fire had gone through there. It laid on the ground, and it burned itself out. It was in a large enough area that it did not burn in that area.

Unfortunately, where you had just a thin, light, little strip of a quarter mile or half mile, the fire jumped right over it. I saw that as well in different areas.

Part of the problem is a phenomenon that exists particularly in the West, where you have dry, hot conditions on the ground. The fire crowns out, as you have seen on television, and these massive spires of flame go 100, 150 feet in the air, which creates a plume of high, hot air, smoke, ashes, cinders, carried upward, and it looks like a mushroom cloud from an atomic kind of explosion because the column of hot air rises like this and it creates a mushroom effect. It gets up into the cooler atmosphere, 15,000, 20,000 feet, and it cannot rise any more because the heat doesn't sustain it. The cool air dampens it down and begins to create condensation. Eventually, the weight of the plume that has risen is greater than the capacity of the hot air to sustain it and it collapses. The firefighters call it a phenomenon of a collapsing plume. What happens then is the whole thing comes crashing down, creating a huge rush of air down on the ground, which pushes out all of the hot cinders, sparks, smoke, and ash out, like this, for 2 or 3 miles.

That happened many times in the Rodeo-Chediski fire. I witnessed the creation of one such plume in an area of Canyon Creek, where I have been hiking and camping. It was devastated by this fire. So it doesn't do you any good to create a bulldozer kind of a firebreak, or a quarter of a mile or half mile of thinning, if the fire can spread with such ferocity. That is what happened over and over in this particular fire.

Let me explain that, notwithstanding the fact that there had been some treatment around some of our communities. Just stop and think about this for a moment. About 30,000 Arizonans had to pick up everything they had within about a 6-hour—I forget exactly how many hours of warning it was, but it was very few hours. They had to pick up what they could in their pickup trucks and cars and find somewhere else to live for the next 2 weeks. Show Low, AZ, is a town of over 20,000, 25,000 people, and in Pinetop and Lakeside and McNary, a few smaller towns, they all had to leave. They could not go back in for anything. A few people tried to feed livestock and keep horses and cattle and pets alive, but a lot was lost when these people had to be gone for 2 weeks.

Just think of having to leave your home and not knowing whether it was going to burn or not. Some did burn, but the towns were saved.

Interestingly, one of the reasons Show Low was saved was that a canyon to the southwest had been treated. It had been thinned, and there had been prescribed burning in that area I believe 2 or 3 years before; I have forgotten exactly how long before.

When the fire hit that area, the combination of that plus the backfire they lit in this particular canyon prevented the fire from reaching the outskirts—it reached the outskirts but prevented the fire from burning the town of Show Low.

Think about that. What we need to do is not treat quarter-mile or half-mile or even mile-long strips of property around fancy summer homes or small communities but, rather, treat the forest itself—as much as we can treat, as quickly as we can treat it. Only in that way will we get the environment back to the healthy state it was.

Only by treating large areas of the forest will we be able to return it to the status shown on this chart, where the small mammals will have a place to graze, really small animals will have a place to hide from the hawks, which will have a place to get the small mammals. We will have the birds, the butterflies, and more introduced as a result of this kind of treatment.

I mentioned before the issue of salvage timber. There is objection even to going in and cutting down the trees. I will show a chart of these trees. This is a huge amount of timber that could be salvaged as a result of the fire. In this kind of landscape, we need to cut some of the trees to lay it down and stop some of the erosion which inevitably occurs because of this kind of fire. It will enhance the regrowth of that area. Even seeding and planting does not do any good because the water washes all that material into the streambeds and it does not take.

This is timber that has a huge amount of value if it is able to be removed quickly, but disease will set in and deterioration will occur within a few months. If it is not removed in a 12-to-18 month period, it is lost. This is one way to help pay for what we are trying to do. Rabid, radical environmentalists do not want to even salvage that timber. Why? Again, because it will actually provide some jobs for the commercial timber industry and the mills that would mill the trees into lumber. They do not want them to be in existence because they then pose a threat to the rest of the forest. That is their logic. It is amazing logic.

Most of the Rodeo-Chediski fire was not on Forest Service land. Sixty-some percent was on the White Mountain Apache Indian Reservation. One can see on this chart the area of the fire. The green area is the Apache-Sitgreaves National Forest, and the yellow area is the Fort Apache Indian Reservation.

The White Mountain Apache Tribe relies a great deal on the revenues of its timber operations to sustain its tribal operations. In fact, it is the tribe's biggest source of revenue.

Also significant to the tribe is the revenue it derives from the hunting that it permits on its land. The White Mountain Apache Tribe for decades has been very smart about how they have managed their forests. They understand that if you are going to have wild turkey, if you are going to have bear, if you are going to have wildcat, huge elk that people are willing to pay $10,000 to hunt, if you are going to have that kind of wildlife that will bring in these kinds of trophy hunters who will pay the tribe a lot of money to hunt on the reservation, then you have to do a couple of things. First, you can only take out the number of animals necessary to keep healthy herds, a healthy group of bear or lion, or whatever it might be.

So they take out very few of those animals, just enough to keep the forest ecosystem in balance.

Second, you have to have a healthy forest. You have to have a forest that is not all grown over in this dog-hair thicket environment but, rather, the more open forest that I showed before. The reason is that these elk have to have grass on which to graze, as I said. You are not going to have an environment where the lions are going to be able to go after the smaller critters because there will not be any small critters if they do not have places to forage and places to hide.

The White Mountain Apache Tribe has been very smart about the way they have managed the forests. They have not been subject to the same restrictions as has the Forest Service. They have been able to do more prescribed burns. They have been able to do thinning and utilize that small-diameter timber in their mills, and they have taken out modest amounts of medium- and a little bit of larger diameter timber as well.

Some environmentalists say: You cannot do that; there has to be a diameter cap of 20 inches, 16 inches, or some number. The tribe has not been subjected to that. It has asked itself the question—it is the type of question experts, such as Wally Covington from Northern Arizona University, ask: Not to define old growth or diameter cap, but take a look at the area and determine its carrying capacity. What will this particular area carry? What did it carry 100 years ago in terms of the kinds of trees, and other growth, and the number of trees?

When one determines that, then one knows what kind of treatment is called for. In some areas, you are going to cut all but 150 trees, leaving mostly large trees with a few more intermediate-size trees. In other areas, you may cut less. It may be that an area is so full of medium-size growth trees, let's say 20-inch diameter trees—you may be taking several of those out or maybe quite a few of those out. It does not mean you are harming the environment. It means you are reducing the number of stems to the carrying capacity of the land so it can rejuvenate, so it can grow back, and the trees left will be the magnificent trees we are trying to preserve. We will have grass and all the rest that is necessary for healthy flora and fauna.

That is the idea of this treatment. Over the years, the Apache Tribe has done a good job managing their forests. As a result, they have had less of a problem with fire. There are several different areas that have been treated, and in the bear report that followed the devastating fire, there is quite a bit of discussion about the kind of timber that was lost, the areas that were not as heavily damaged, and a discussion of the areas preserved, by and large, because they had been treated in the past.

I find it interesting, by the way, and I am going to digress here—let me make this point. We need to help the Fort Apache Tribe salvage the timber that is salvageable in this area. They do not have the capacity in their mills to do it, but they can mill some of it and then sell some of it to others. They have to get to it right away. They are making plans to do that. They need about $6.7 million to complete this project. I hope we will be able to provide that to them and it will help sustain the reservation.

As to the Forest Service, there are objections already to salvaging the same timber. We do not know where this boundary is when we are on the ground. It is all the same. Why the Apache area can be salvaged but not the Forest Service area I cannot explain. Nobody can rationally explain it. We need to salvage there as well. Yet there are those who object to any opportunity to salvage this timber.

One of the ideas for legislation was to have an opportunity to complete some stewardship projects or enhanced value projects that would in a temporary way—maybe over a 3-year-period of time, for example—treat areas of the forest that have not burned to see how well this kind of management worked.

This has been tried in the past. One of the cases is the so-called Baca timber sale. When we talk about timber sales, some of the more radical environmentalists get all upset because we are actually going to sell some timber to a mill that can mill it into lumber and build homes and lower the price of homes, by the way, so we do not have to buy all the timber from Canada at higher prices.

This Baca timber sale was proposed in 1994 to reduce hazardous fuels both in the interface and to improve forest health. It followed 5 years of planning and public participation. All the stakeholders were involved. But environmentalists appealed and litigated the case for 3 years.

The Baca timber sale was in this area. When the Rodeo fire went through that area, it burned about 90 percent of the proposed area. An area that could have been treated, that could have been made healthy, that the fire would largely have skipped around, was left to be ravaged by this catastrophic fire. The same environmental groups currently threaten lawsuits that would prevent the restoration of this area, which is why I mention that.

I ask my colleagues, when are we going to say we are no longer going to be jerked around by the radical environmentalists' agenda to destroy the commercial timber industry so they never have to worry about any big trees being cut, in the process permitting the forests to burn, destroying the habitat, endangering lives, burning homes, and burning up the same trees they want to save, as well as the environment for the species?

I mentioned before some of the species. The goshawk is an example. In 1996, the Forest Service proposed a project to thin near the nest of the goshawk, partly to reduce the fire hazards that were presented to the goshawk. These radical environmentalists appealed. That year the fire burned through the forests, including the goshawk nest. That is what happens when irresponsible environmentalists have control.

What does the control result from? It results from the fact we have a legal system that was designed to provide the maximum environmental input into decisions about abuse by some of the radical environmental groups. Let me cite some statistics from a report released in July by the Forest Service that covered the appeal and litigation activities on the mechanical treatment projects during the last 2-year period. Out of 326 Forest Service decisions during this study period, 155 were appealed, more than half; 21 decisions that were administratively appealed ultimately led to Federal lawsuits.

What happens with the lawsuits? You get an injunction which prevents you from moving forward with the project. In many cases either it burns while the project is pending or the Forest Service decided to move on rather than fight the appeal. The appeal, therefore, goes away, the work never having been done.

In the southwestern region of Arizona and New Mexico, 73 percent of all treatment decisions were appealed. Nationwide it was almost half—48 percent of the project decisions in fiscal year 2001 and 2002. Again, 73 percent in our area were appealed.

We cannot operate that way. The Forest Service is spending half of its budget preparing for these projects and fighting them and doing the work in litigation and on appeals to respond to the environmental community activity. About half of their budget is spent directly fighting the appeals, dealing with the injunctions, or preparing the projects in such a way as to be immune from this kind of litigation, which almost inevitably appears anyway.

On administrative appeals alone in 1999 through 2001, in Arizona—just one State—environmental groups filed 287 administrative appeals; 75 of these were filed by two groups that are very active. In litigation in the last 5 years, the Sierra Club and the Center for Biological Diversity litigated 11 projects in Arizona and in 10 years litigated 17 projects, including the Baca timber sale which was 90 percent burned while on appeal because of the litigation that ensued.

This is what has to stop. The administration, President Bush, has visited these areas and has concluded that the best way to try to deal with this problem is to keep the environmental laws in place so there is never any question about the application of the proper standards for the projects that are developed but to make it more difficult for those who are appealing for the sake of delay, to delay projects to the point they are no longer worth proceeding. In other words, move the process along.

The President's idea is you still have to have sales or projects that comply with the NEPA process where there is environmental review by the State holders, but you cannot get a temporary restraining order or preliminary permanent injunction in court unless the court decided the case and imposed a permanent injunction on the sale, but you could not go in advance and get that injunction, which is frequently what happens today.

In addition to that, the administrative appeals would be reduced or eliminated for certain sales. If you want to file suit, you can file suit and go directly to the judge. The hope would be that the judge would decide the case quickly and therefore either the project moves forward or it doesn't, but everyone knows they can move forward with alternative plans if the project cannot move forward. It seems to me on a trial basis, a limited basis, that would make sense.

What we proposed was we limit this proposal to class 3 areas—in my State of Arizona it would be only the red areas—that we limit it in time to maybe a 3-year authorization so we see how it works. If people do not think it works, we do not have to continue it. And that we limit the amount of acres that would be treated—maybe 5, 7, or 10 million acres per year, something like that. That, obviously, could be negotiated. And you would limit the way in which the appeals could be brought and have no temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction to be able to stop a particular sale. There would also be no limitation on the salvage projects I mentioned before.

Now, would these projects be logging? Would they be clearcut, et cetera? Of course not. First, they would have to be pursuant to the plans that have been developed by the forests. All of these regional plans have long ago discarded any kind of clearcut cutting. They have basically adopted the management theory of reducing the small diameter underbrush and small diameter trees, leaving, by and large, the larger older trees that we want to preserve.

Those are the plans in place now. They are the plans that would be proposed. If there is any plan that is not consistent with that, obviously, people could file a lawsuit and they could go to court and say, judge, this is not consistent with what we had in mind. And the court, of course, could say, that is right. If the proper environmental analysis had not been done or was inconsistent with the plan, the project could be stopped. That is what we are proposing.

As I said before, we have been in negotiations with our friends on the other side of the aisle. I mention in particular Senator FEINSTEIN from California has been very helpful in trying to find some middle ground, to craft a plan to permit us, over a very short period of time, to be able to treat a small amount of acreage and see how well it works. If it works well, perhaps we could go on from that. We got to the point of having a 1-year authorization, with 5 or 7 million acres maximum to be treated. It would be limited to this class 3 area. And a high priority would be given to urban wildland interface and to municipal watershed areas. Even that has not been accepted.

The question is whether or not we are going to be able to reach an agreement that permits us to fairly quickly pass an amendment, have it adopted and sent to the other body so we can begin negotiation for a conference report that enables us to send something to the President and begin treating these forests or whether we are basically going to be in a stalemate or gridlock with the two different camps in the Senate, neither one having the votes to prevail, with the result that nothing comes out of this legislative session and we will be left with an opportunity missed, and a heightened risk for the forests that we want to preserve.

That is the choice before the Senate. I call upon my colleagues who have been working on this to try to find a way to enable us to be able to treat some of the acres in good faith, and see how it works, and if it does work well, as we predict it will, to enable us to expand that to the roughly 30 million acres that the General Accounting Office said we need to treat or else see burned.

Those are the stakes. I call upon my environmental friends, who are mostly concerned about protecting these areas of the forests, to think about the priorities.

Do we want to protect the habitat for those endangered species that we all would like to preserve? Do we want to protect the habitat for all the other flora and fauna? Do we want to have a healthy forest or do we want, in effect, to let it go to seed, risking catastrophic fire, disease, and insect devastation which will not protect the environment but will destroy it for all the purposes I mentioned before?

That is the choice before us. It seems to me there is no better time to act and, in fact, this may be the last opportunity to act this year in order to achieve this result. I urge my colleagues to find this compromise; if not, to support the kind of effort I propose that is a limited project with very tight constraints—in effect, a pilot or demonstration project to see if we can make this kind of forest management work.

I thank my colleagues for their indulgence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Madam President, administration budget requests and congressional appropriations bills are a clear reflection of our priorities as a nation. As was discussed on the floor earlier today, it seems we had, from the administration, a focus on Iraq and nothing else.

I am happy to see a bill just came from the House. I would like very much to see other things coming from the House, not the least of which is the rest of the appropriations bills and the matters that are now in conference. No. 1 on the top of my list is the terrorism insurance bill. We need to have that done.

I think now we have the second debacle in a row in Florida. We have election reform that we have passed. It would be nice to finish that conference report as well as the Patients' Bill of Rights and the generic drug bill that seems lost over there sometimes. We have a lot of things that we need to complete.

And, of course, bankruptcy reform. Senator CARPER came to me this morning, here on the floor, and told me how desperately his constituents feel this is necessary to help many different industries. So there are a lot of things we need to do.

I listened patiently to the very erudite remarks of the Senator from Arizona. I would say it is not an either/or situation. It is not a question of forests burn down or the radical environmentalists caused all this. The fact is, what we are proposing is instead of 70 percent of the money being spent where there are no people, we reverse that and have 70 percent of the money spent in places such as Lake Tahoe, a beautiful lake shared by California and Nevada. We are very concerned about what happens if a fire occurs there.

My friend from Arizona said there are million-dollar homes, that is what we are trying to protect—and I am sure there are, in the Lake Tahoe area, some very expensive homes. But remember, this is also an area of hotels, motels, and ski lodges and the service people who work in those are not millionaires and don't have millionaire homes but they need to be protected. That is what this is all about.

As I said, the administration budget request and appropriations bills are a clear reflection of our priorities as a nation. It is where rhetoric meets reality. In an economic downturn, and that is what we are in now, it is more important to put people first, ahead of—instead of handouts to—corporations.

Unfortunately, I am sorry to say, the Bush administration's so-called healthy forest initiative would add to its already impressive list of corporate giveaways. This proposal is anti-community and anti-environment, plain and simple.

My friend is in a neighboring State, Arizona, and I know they have suffered these devastating fires. We have watched them and feel for them. But the answer is not to bash on radical environmentalists. That is not the cause of these fires. We have a number of people in America who feel very strongly that the proposals made by my friend from Arizona, where you basically take away judicial review of decisions made, is wrong. I do not think there are many who would put the League of Conservation Voters in the camp of radical environmentalists. In fact, I think they are very moderate. They see things the way the American people see things—a way to protect the environment. The League of Conservation Voters will grade all of us, all 100 Senators, on this amendment and on this vote.

I think it would be a shame if, because of the pending Craig amendment, that the minority would vote not to invoke cloture on this most important piece of legislation. We need to move forward with this bill. If cloture is invoked, the Craig amendment falls—no question about that. But we have tried to work something out and we have been unable to work it out.

My good friend from Oregon, Senator WYDEN—who is a consensus builder, who is a longtime legislator—understands the art of legislation is the art of compromise. He has worked for weeks trying to come up with a compromise. If Senator WYDEN can't do it, it cannot be done, because he is someone who understands legislation and how to work out a so-called deal.

The League of Conservation Voters will grade us on this amendment in its annual scorecard. Whoever votes to agree to this amendment will fail, in their eyes, fail to protect the environment. That is what this vote is all about today.

Like the Bush plan, the Republican amendment is championed as a way to address the real fear and suffering of those who live in danger of wildfires. Sadly, this is simply a smokescreen for another corporate handout. This is tragic because wildfires have burned roughly 100,000 acres in Nevada and more than 6.3 million acres nationwide this year. The fire season is already one of the worst in the record. In Nevada, it is past. That doesn't mean we can't still have devastating fires, but this fire season has been bad. The one before it was bad. By December of this year we may have the grim distinction of it being the worst year for wildfires in American history.

Faced with this devastation, what is the administration's plan? It proposes to suspend environmental reviews of timber projects, making it easier for timber companies to harvest large, healthy, fire-resistant and, of course, profitable trees. The Republican plan will suspend the main environmental law applicable to our forest, NEPA, the National Environmental Policy Act. That is the law that forces the Forest Service to ensure its timber sales don't hurt the environment. It is the avenue through which local people and governments review these sales.

It would also prevent any meaningful judicial review of timber company and Forest Service actions. That is what this pending amendment would do. That is because in the Republican plan the issuance of temporary restraining orders and preliminary injunctions is prohibited. That is what restraining orders are all about. If you do not have a restraining order, by the time you get to court the trees are gone. What is the point of judicial review if the trees have already been clearcut by the time you walk through the courthouse door?

The Republican amendment also fails to target funding to the places where forests meet our communities, where people and property are at greatest risk. This is not a situation where there will not be work done in areas outside of municipalities, places where people live. But we are saying let's reverse things. Instead of spending 70 percent of the money where there are no people, let's spend 70 percent of the money where there are people.

The Republican amendment does not require that a certain percentage of funds be spent on wildlife/urban interface. Instead, it gives the Forest Service discretion to carve out big tree timber sales and cast aside community concerns, as they have been doing for such a long time.

There is no hard target to protect our communities because that is not what the Republican plan is about. It is about making it easier for the Administration to sell our forests to their favorite timber companies.

We already have a stack of GAO reports detailing the myriad of ways that our forests are mismanaged by our agencies.

For example, we know that government agencies do not target funding to the wildland-urban boundary where we can best protect lives and livelihoods.

According to the President's own budget, only one-third of the fuels reduction budget was spent to directly protect people and homes. That report came out in February of this year.

Think about that. The Forest Service has a record of spending most funding out in the forests, away from people. That is not an acceptable record. They support logging of large, profitable—and fire resistant—trees. They place lower value on hazardous fuel reduction projects on forests and rangeland around communities.

Don't just take my word for it. In response to GAO requests, Forest Service officials themselves stated that they tend to "(1) focus on areas with high-value commercial timber rather than on areas with high fire hazards or (2) include more large, commercially valuable trees in a timber sale than are necessary to reduce accumulated fuels."

How does the President reward agency mismanagement? By repealing public oversight. The record of agencies in managing our forests demonstrates just how important it is to have that oversight.

When my colleagues vote on the Republican plan, they should ask "Would it truly help communities threatened by fire?" The answer is no.

I hope the minority will vote to invoke cloture and have this amendment go down. The Craig amendment should fall.

The big trees that would fall as a result of this amendment aren't the main cause of the wildfires now scorching many states—including mine, the State of Nevada, and of course, all over the West.

The real personal and economic danger facing Americans in the areas where our wildlands meet our communities is being used as the disguise for this latest giveaway to big corporations.

The Administration and the Republican amendment don't focus resources on these areas—a principle embraced in the National Fire Plan and the Western Governors' Association. I don't think they are radical environmentalists.

Instead, they make it easier to squander fire money on projects that are far from communities and that threaten to worsen future fires.

I am sorry that it appears that it is the modus operandi of the Bush Administration—roll back environmental laws, cut the public out of the process, keep people in the dark and turn over a public resource to corporations.

Corporations can handle anything; any problem in America, turned over to corporations. We need oversight of these corporations.

In this case, that choice puts people in harm's way—it diverts taxpayer dollars from public safety and, in many instances, to private plundering. We should instead spend fire money on projects that reduce the risk to communities in forests and rangeland at high risk of wildfire.

Mr. President, Nevada has relatively little commercial timber but we do have a terrible hazardous fuels problem that threatens Nevadans from Caliente to Reno—all over the State. Past practice proves that Congress needs to direct spending these funds to protect communities rather than accepting the President's new proposal.

Protecting people should be our priority today, not paving the way for companies to remove great trees from our public lands.

There could still be work done, and there will be work done in areas that the Senator from Arizona says there should be. What we are saying is all the money shouldn't be spent there. We are also asking: Why not have judicial review? Why not have the ability to look at what is being done by these agencies?

No one wants these fires to occur. They are devastating. But you have to recognize what appeared in, I believe, today's Washington Post—it could have been in yesterday's Washington Post—and what happened in Montana 2 years after the devastating fires. They reviewed in depth what happened there. We know fires have been burning for centuries—forever. You need to have these fires occur on occasion. That is why we have prescribed burning in all of the country. It is too bad we had the serious problem with prescribed burning in New Mexico. But we need prescribed burning. Burning makes for healthier forests. We have to deal with what we are calling for in the amendment that we want to offer; that is, have prescribed burning to make healthier forests. We want to improve forests so we have nature doing what it has to do.

We know pine trees can only germinate if there is a fire. There is new growth of pine trees after fires, which pop the pinecones, and causes the planting. That is something which is extremely important.

We tried to work something out on a compromise basis. We can't do that. The majority leader made the right decision. A cloture motion was filed. We are going to vote on that this evening.

I hope the Craig amendment will fall so we can move forward with this bill and complete this legislation.

I am disappointed we won't be able to offer our amendment. Our amendment would also not be germane. That is too bad because I believe we should focus on what is going to happen in urban centers—in areas where there are people. Hopefully, we can get the mix of money being spent so that more is done there and not out in the middle of nowhere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BURNS. Madam President, I cannot sit idly by and not offer some comment on the Senator's statement.

No. 1, the Senator has flopped the money in regard to the President's budget. I might add that at least the president completed a budget. Seventy percent of this money would go to wildland urban interface, and 30 percent goes to the less populated areas, not the other way around as the Senator from Nevada suggested.

In this amendment, we change no environmental law. We deny no one the appeal process. Both administratively and judicially, those things don't change.

What I am asking Senators and this country to consider are environmental laws, NEPA, clean water, clean air, and the Forest Management Act, which has been in effect for some 25 years. We have been operating and managing under those laws for that long without some reform. Look at the track record. I'm asking for proof you are right to deny this; prove us wrong.

For years and years, I have followed football a little. I guess what makes that game great is there is only one rule book, and it is in every State across the Union. If we want to bring some discipline, look at that fact and compare it to what we are doing in our judicial system.

When I look at the appeals process—as the chief of the Forest Service said the other day, if you get 999 people out of 1,000 to agree on a management decision, it can all be stopped by one person. That has been the case ever since these laws were put into effect. We see the result, we get growth, and we burn. We do away with grazing, and we burn. If we do away with active management of a renewable resource, what was there before? We saw younger trees that grew old, matured, died, and regrowth occurred.

Once again, look at the track record of the management we have been under for the last 25 years. We see great regrowth and reforestation even in clearcuts where that management has worked: New trees, new forests, a renewable resource that is in demand by the American public, to carry on into the next generation and the next generation, a renewable resource that can be used by all Americans, all Americans; that is, if housing and the use of lumber appeals to you.

I realize some folks don't worry about the cost of a home or people getting into their first home. The folks on the other side of this issue are less caring about it. The League of Conservation Voters—who are a pretty moderate group, have a little radical group among them that actually makes the policy to carry out their appeals process in this situation.

Make no mistake about it, if they who want to manage the forests differently want us to prove why we think this plan would work, then I ask for the other side to use the same system to prove theirs has worked. For 25 years, those management practices have all but culminated, in the last 4 years, in the destruction of a renewable resource which could have been somewhat prevented.

Yes, there will always be fires. They even slash and burn after harvest is over. Do you know what? They grow back. They are wonderful. They are beautiful. But what I fear is that the way this system is now, people who have never had any dirt under their fingerprints are making the management decisions on a resource that should be used for generations to come. It just does not make a lot of sense to me.

Compare the track records. No money goes to corporations. No law is changed. All rights are preserved. We are saying let's put the football at the 50-yard line. Nobody likes to start on their own 20.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. Madam President, we are attempting to make a very important policy determination on the management of our public lands. Many of us have been on the floor over the last good number of years to talk with some concern about the changing character of our public lands and the impending crisis that might occur under the normal climate cycles across the United States as a result of catastrophic wildfires on our forested public lands.

Tragically enough, many of the alarms we were talking about were based on studies done over several decades, that inactive management of our public lands, in the absence of fire, was allowing a fuel buildup that ultimately could result in catastrophic wildfires.

We are now at that point where it has become obvious to the American public, from watching television this summer, and seeing the fires that have raged across the western forests, that something is wrong out there; that this was not a normal environment; that this was something they were not used to; Why were these beautiful forests now burning?

They were burning, they are burning—they are still burning—and have been since mid-June because of public policy that had largely taken fire out of the ecosystem but had not allowed a comparable activity in the ecosystem of our forested lands that would remove the underbrush and the small trees and maintain the kind of environmental balance that was there prior to European man coming upon the scene a couple hundred years ago, and especially in the last 65 to 70 years when we had become very good at putting out fires in our forests. It is from that perspective that brings us to the floor today.

A few moments ago, my colleague from Arizona was on the floor talking in great detail about the wildfires that swept across his State this summer—the white forests of southwestern Arizona, and the phenomenal damage that occurred there. It nearly wiped out an entire community. It clearly destroyed valuable ecosystems and watersheds and wildlife habitat to a point of ultimate devastation.

It, in fact, has created such an environment that it denies Mother Nature, once she has done this damage, the ability to come back and to create a resilient forest in a reasonably short period of time. By that I mean several decades.

These fires are now so intense, based on the fuel loading on these lands, that it is equivalent to literally tens of thousands of gallons of gasoline per acre in Btu's. The fire burns deep into the soil, soil loaded with organic materials that absorb and hold water and allow plants to flourish, creating what are known as hydrophobic soils. In other words, it caramelizes them; it fuses them; it ultimately destroys the ability of these lands to reproduce for decades.

Of course, because you have denied the ability of the land to absorb water, when the rains come in the fall, massive landslides, erosion, and watershed damage occurs. Right now, in Colorado, with the current rainfall, landslides are occurring as we speak. They are not making the national news that the fires that swept across those lands a couple of months ago did, but they are making the local news because the roads are blocked, people cannot traverse the area, watersheds are being damaged, and, of course, the quality of the water that now flows into the reservoirs that supply the urban areas of Denver and other places is in question—all because of public policy and a perception that has prevailed in public policy for the last several decades that inactive management, no management, man's hand not present in the forest, was, by far, the better way to go.

I am not even questioning the fact that several of the industries that were prevalent in our forests over the last century have lost credibility in the eyes of the American people. I am not even going to argue that forest policy of 30 years ago, based on certain attitudes and certain images, projected by national environmental groups, has not changed attitudes and has caused us to lose the support of the American public on certain aspects of national U.S. forest policy. I believe most of that is true.

But what I also believe is true is that a radical move from one position to the other, and holding the far position on the other side, is just as bad as maybe clear cutting policies of 40 or 50 years ago.

Many will now argue: But we are saving old-growth forests across our country by disallowing the human hand to touch the land. I suggest to those who so argue that this year we have lost over 2½ to 3 million acres of old-growth forest because we were not allowed to go in and take out the underbrush and the small trees that are below these older trees. And as the fires swept across the land, it took everything, including the old growth.

So radicalism or extremism or a fixed policy on one extreme or the other can produce the wrong results.

Putting good stewards on the land who understand the science of the land and the science of the forest itself is, by far, the better way to go. But in the last decades, we have decided that the policy was bad. I say, collectively, as a Congress, we have decided that. So we began to micromanage from the floor of the Senate. Every Senator influenced by some of his or her environmental friends decided they were the forest experts. They would legislate the particulars or they would deny certain actions that should be happening on the public lands.

As a result, over the last number of years, we have seen the average number of fires and total number of acres destroyed per year begin to rapidly increase on our public forested lands.

What was once an average burn of 1 million, 1.5 million to 2 million acres a year is now up into the 6 to 7 to 8 million acres a year. And it seems now, if you were to graph it, to be progressively climbing.

This year we have now burned about 6.5 million acres of forested land—not just burned it but destroyed it. There is hardly a tree standing—watersheds destroyed, land hydrophobic, wildlife habitat gone. Mother Nature will not come in there and replace herself for a decade. In the meantime, watersheds will slip and slide off the face of these mountains in landslides, riparian areas destroyed and urban areas at risk.

We are, therefore, going to sit here, as a Congress, and say: This is OK. This is the right thing to do.

The majority leader some months ago knew that in the Black Hills of South Dakota it wasn't the right thing to do, and he was able to work with groups and accomplish for South Dakota some of what we would like to accomplish for the rest of the forested States of our country: an active form of management that brings groups together, creates local public interest, understands the dynamics of good stewardship, and allows some degree of active management.

So for the last several weeks we have worked very closely with a variety of Senators from both sides of the aisle to see if there was not a bipartisan way of accomplishing this. Tragically, some interest groups have some of our colleagues so locked into a single position that they can find no flexibility in their vote.

My colleague from Oregon, RON WYDEN, and Senator DIANNE FEINSTEIN of California have worked closely with us to try to make some of these changes. They have come a long way. I, too, have come a long way in trying to craft a middle ground that will allow active management on a select number of acres of land to prove to the American public that what we can do can be done right not only in improving forest health but, at the same time, not damaging the environment and, in a very short time, allowing that land to rapidly improve as wildlife habitat and watershed quality land and also be productive for additional tree production for the housing industry and for the American consumer that would like to own a stick-built home.

Last week, Senator DOMENICI of New Mexico and I offered an amendment that we thought was a comprehensive effort to come to the middle ground, to a position that both sides could support. We took the advice of the western Governors who met with the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture some months ago to express the very concern I and other Western colleagues have expressed about the state of at least the western forests and to try to arrive at a collaborative process that would allow both sides to come together.

In our amendment, what we have offered is basically allowing a collaborative process to go forward at the State levels to select those lands most critically in need of active management for the kind of thinning and cleaning that would be most desirable under these areas and, at the same time, to recognize the clear protection that would come as a result of existing forest plans, to not override forest plans that most of our States have on a forest-by-forest basis, but to recognize that those are appropriate planning processes, that the efforts we would recommend to improve forest health would be consistent with the resource management plans and other applicable agency plans.

We would establish a limited priority of action, and that limited priority would be in the wildland/urban interface areas. This year, we have lost over 2,100 human dwellings while we have lost 6.5 million acres of wildlife dwellings. So the human, in this instance, is experiencing phenomenal damage to his or her dwelling, just as is wildlife. As a result of that, we recognize the most critical need of trying to resolve the wildland/urban interface.

I see my colleague from West Virginia on the floor at the moment. He was very willing to put additional money into firefighting this year. It is part of this amendment on the floor now.

Why? Not only do we need it, but now the Forest Service spends most of its time protecting houses instead of protecting trees and wildlife habitat and watershed. Why? Because over the last 25 years in the West, every piece of non-Federal land that is in the timbered areas has found it to be a place where people like to live. They have built beautiful homes out there. As a result, we now have a conflict that we did not have 25 years or 30 years ago when fire became an issue on our public lands. So we are dealing with the wildland/urban interface areas.

The other area I mentioned, now very critical in the West, is the municipal watershed area. These are the watersheds that provide the water and the impoundment or where water is collected for our growing urban areas. Many of those were devastated this year. I was on one in Denver, Colorado; now devastated, water that will now flow into the reservoirs that will feed the city of Denver. Much of that water will have the result of an acid base produced by the ashes of the forest fires that destroyed the watersheds of that area.

We also recognize that forested or range land areas affected by disease, insect activity, and what we call wind throw or wind blowdown, those are the areas that are now dead or dying. As a result of that, those are most susceptible to fire. We have recognized the need to get into some of those areas. That would be important to do.

Lastly, areas susceptible to what we call reburn, where the fire flashes across it, largely kills the trees, and then causes those trees to die, making them more susceptible to fire.

We have also said that this approach, while extraordinary, will include only 10 million acres. When I say only 10 million, I am talking about over 300 million forested Federal acres in our Nation under the direction and management of the U.S. Forest Service. These forested public lands encompass a very small amount. This would be showcased over a limited period of time with substantial restrictions. So that would be very important, and the process would have some limitations as it relates to current law: That we would not allow appeals or injunctions, but that there would be a judicial review process on a project-by-project basis. It would allow the filing in a Federal district court for which the Federal lands are located within 7 days after legal notice when a decision to conduct a project under the section is made. In other words, we do provide a legal remedy for those who openly object to any of this activity.

As I and others have said, and the President said over a month ago, we will not lock the courthouse door. While we think it is tremendously important that we begin to deal with forest health, we should not deny the fundamental process in the end. And we would not deny locking the courthouse door so that there could be a review as these actions proceeded.

Those are the fundamentals of what we are proposing to do—a limited nature, 10 million acres, to allow the groups to come together on a State-by-State basis to meet with the Forest Service and examine those acres and the most critical need of action, and to recommend to the Forest Service those areas, to allow a limited environmental review to go forward and, through that recommendation, then move to expedite the process in a way that is commensurate with forest health.

(Mr. JOHNSON assumed the Chair.)

Mr. CRAIG. If we could treat 5, or 6, or 7 million acres a year, and by that, I mean thinning and cleaning, leaving the old growth; our legislation talks about leaving no less than 10 trees per acre of the oldest trees, and more if it fits the landscape, or the species, or the watershed in which this activity would be going on.

But even if we do all of that—if the public would allow us, and this Senate were to vote to become active managers of our lands once again—with all of that, the state of our forests is now in such disrepair from a health, fuel-loading, big-kill standpoint, that in the years to come we are still going to lose 4, 5, 6, 7 million acres a year to wildfire. It is simply a situation of human creation by public policy that has denied active and reasonable management on these lands for several decades now. As a result of that, we have a tragedy in the making.

But if we act, in the course of the next decade we can save 700, 800, or a million acres of old growth and watershed and wildlife habitat, by these actions, that might otherwise be burned by wildfire. That is the scenario and the issue as I see it. It is also the issue that some of our top forest scientists see.

Is it a political issue today? Tragically enough, it has been politicized. There seems to be a loud chorus of people out there who say: Do nothing. The tragedy today is that a do-nothing scenario is, without question, more destructive to the environment than a do-something scenario could ever be, because it would be total destruction instead of limited damage in some areas that we treat, as we move to protect the old trees and guard against entry into the roadless areas at this moment in time, but still allow the thinning, cleaning, and fuel removal to come out of these acreages, as proposed by the Craig-Domenici amendment that is now pending.

So I hope my colleagues will support us and join with us. While the fires have dominantly been in the West this year, this is not just a western issue. We are fortunate to have forested public lands all over our country. Here in the East, similar problems are now happening: Overpopulation of our forests, even in the hard woods, bug kill, fuel loading; and now we are beginning to see more of our forests in the East, along the Allegheny and the Blue Ridge and down into the South, become ripe for burn during certain seasons of the year.

So it is a situation that is now beginning to repeat itself in the East as much as it has since the late 1990s out in the West. So I believe it is a national issue of substantial importance and one that we ought to spend time debating and understanding.

I encourage my colleagues to visit with me, Senator DOMENICI, or others who have offered this amendment, trying to seek a balanced approach to allow the U.S. Forest Service to begin the program of selective, active management of thinning and cleaning, using a comprehensive, collaborative approach on a State-by-State basis, with interest groups from those areas, in a way that will begin to restore the forest health of this Nation.

We may have a cloture vote at about 5:15. I hope my colleagues will not vote for cloture but will give us an opportunity to vote up or down on this amendment, as I think we are entitled, because we believe it is not only good policy but it is a critical and necessary vote for our country.

With that, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. How much time does the Senator from New Mexico want for his speech?

Mr. DOMENICI. I didn't know whether we had any time left on our side.

Mr. BYRD. I believe we have until 12:30 overall.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. I would ask for 5 minutes at this point.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, do I have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, Mr. DOMENICI, for not to exceed 5 minutes, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

I have heard most of the statement on the floor by my distinguished friend and colleague, Senator CRAIG, with whom I am a cosponsor of a very important amendment. We have a number of Democrats and Republicans who have joined us on this amendment. All I want to do is suggest that if we are going to have cloture this afternoon, I hope that, with reference to a cloture that will take this amendment down, Senators will not do that.

We have not had very much time. It is a very important and easy-to-understand issue. It will be confronted with an opposition amendment, which we have not seen yet, that will be forthcoming by the majority leader and, perhaps, Senator BINGAMAN. Both of them are moving in a direction of modifying the existing environmental laws that don't let us remove certain kinds of trees from our forests that are, by most people, determined to be the kind of trees you should remove. They either result in a burndown, or have the result of what is called a blowdown where whole portions of a forest are blown over, or they have just accumulated and are not growing because there is so much rubbish left over that you cannot get the Sun to do any good. When the fires come, they go from one place to another, right over the top of trees.

We want to set the timeframe within which objection can be made to going in and cleaning up that kind of forest, that it be moved in a very short period of time and not be subject to lengthy court hearings but, rather, that it move expeditiously.

We got our idea from an amendment the distinguished majority leader attached to a previous appropriation bill. The majority leader did this modification of the environmental laws that restrained removal of certain kinds of forests that were no longer needed and that could be used if you took them out of there rather quickly. The majority leader did that in an amendment and made it apply to a certain forest in his State and, thus, in the State of the occupant of the chair.

I don't have any objection to that amendment today. If the majority leader and his fellow Senator who occupies the chair want to do that, that is their business. It is about their State. I didn't come down to talk about changing environmental laws. I waited a couple weeks and suggested that maybe we ought to do the same thing—that we ought to get some movement in our forests rather than leave these kinds of trees there.

There are many other things wrong with the forests that we are going to have to fix. Essentially, over 6 million acres of our forests have burned—more than twice the 10-year average—in the current fire season. Twenty-one people have been killed and 3,000 structures have burned.

It will be more like an experiment. We will take a piece of these forests, and we will go in and clear them out within a reasonable timeframe, rather than the unreasonable timeframe that has become the procedure heretofore which, by using the courts and various actions of the courts, imposing NEPA and all of its requirements, whenever groups do not want any of this clearance, they win, just by delay.

I thought there would be a unification of purpose and we might get all the Senators to understand this was not an effort to defeat the environmentalists. We did not think they ought to necessarily take sides in opposition to this issue. It is a very realistic, commonsense approach.

We will have more time to discuss it in more detail, and we will get to discuss it at our respective policy luncheons. I thank the Senator for yielding me the 5 minutes. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, what is the situation with respect to time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 10 minutes remaining prior to the recess.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may hold the floor beyond the 10 minutes for a reasonably short period of time. I would say perhaps another 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator. He wants 3 minutes for a statement. So I yield 3 minutes to him. I do not know why I am accommodating all these Senators like this, but I yield 3 minutes. I yield to him without losing my right to the floor for a statement only for not to exceed 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CRAPO. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. CRAPO pertaining to the introduction of S. 2942 are printed in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, over the course of the last several months, the Senate Appropriations Committee has endeavored to craft 13—13—bipartisan, responsible pieces of legislation which fund every aspect of the Federal Government. The Appropriations Committee accomplished its goal. Each bill was adopted by the committee without a single dissenting vote—not one.

This is the largest committee of any committee in the Senate. It is made up of 29 members—15 Democrats and 14 Republicans. So each bill was adopted by the committee without a single dissenting vote: 13 bills, not a single nay vote. That is true bipartisan cooperation. In fact, if one adds up the rollcall votes for the 13 bills, one would have a tally of 377 aye votes to zero nay votes. That is a record for which committee members should be proud.

As all Senators are aware, the appropriations bills are stuck. They are stuck; the ox is in the ditch. The House Appropriations Committee has not acted on five appropriations bills, and the full House has yet to pass eight of the bills, leaving the next fiscal year in a dangerous position of starting without Congress having completed action on the funding legislation.

Why are we in this predicament? While it would be easy to point the finger at the House of Representatives, the blame basically, truly belongs down the avenue—the other end of the avenue.

The White House's Office of Management and Budget remains wedded to an arbitrary budget figure that undercuts the Congress' ability to complete its work in a responsible fashion. The Senate has passed appropriations bills that total $768 billion. Every Senator on the Appropriations Committee voted for that funding level. Every Senator on that committee voted for that funding level of $768 billion. Every Senator on the Appropriations Committee, Democrat and Republican, recognizes that level of $768 billion is a responsible level that provides for the largest Defense spending bill ever, that provides for a significant increase in homeland security funding, and that accommodates just enough to cover the cost of inflation for domestic priorities—priorities such as veterans health care, education. These are not boondoggle bills. These are responsible pieces of legislation.

The House appropriators would be able to complete work on their bills if they were able to utilize the same overall figure. I want to say the fault is not with the House Appropriations Committee chairman. That committee would be able to finish its job. But the White House has insisted that the House allocate no more than $759 billion. So the House is stuck $9 billion below the Senate and weeks behind the calendar for completing its work.

The House needs to get its work done, but more importantly, the administration needs to provide some flexibility to help us to finish these bills. We do not need political games. We need to complete action on 13 individual appropriations bills.

I know; I worked closely with the chairman on the other side, Chairman YOUNG, and with the ranking member on the Democrat side, DAVE OBEY. I worked closely with them. Their heart is in the right place. They know the Senate and the House ought to go to the higher, top line figure, $768 billion. But it is the administration that has its feet in concrete and its head in the sand. No, it wants to stay right on the $759 billion. That is why these appropriations bills are stuck.

Just yesterday—listen to this—in an article in the Wall Street Journal, Mr. Lawrence Lindsey, head of the White House's National Economic Council, projected that the military costs for this so-called war in Iraq will be $100 billion to $200 billion. They were talking about billions of dollars this year alone. I will say that again: Just yesterday, in an article in the Wall Street Journal, Mr. Lawrence Lindsey, head of the White House National Economic Council, projected that the military costs for this so-called war in Iraq will be $100 billion to $200 billion this year alone.

Now, I would consider $100 billion to be quite substantial. That is a lot of money, $100 billion. But Mr. Lindsey says it may go from $100 billion to $200 billion this year alone. I consider $100 billion to be quite a substantial figure, and I would consider $200 billion to be doubly substantial.

Mr. Lindsey, when asked about that level, said: That's nothing. That's nothing—$100 billion to $200 billion, that's nothing? If $100 billion is nothing, Mr. Lindsey, what is $9 billion? How can $100 billion be nothing if the White House is willing to put the entire Government on autopilot over $9 billion? That is why we are not getting the appropriations bills done. The administration, through its Office of Management and Budget, says no more than $759 billion, because he has the authority of the President behind him.

I have heard some strange economic plans in my day, but this one takes the cake. How can $100 billion be nothing, as Mr. Lindsey is quoted as saying, if the White House is willing to put the entire Government on autopilot over $9 billion?

The growth of the fiscal year 2003 appropriations bills is not for the domestic program. The additional $9 billion in the Senate bills will fund the President's requested increases in the Department of Defense and homeland security. For the rest of the Government, that $9 billion is the difference between a hard freeze and a 3-percent adjustment for inflation. But those facts do not seem to matter. They do not seem to matter to this administration.

In times such as these, the administration should be working with Congress to complete action on these appropriations bills, not attempting to hamstring Congress at every turn.

Obviously, the Office of Management and Budget has adopted a strategy that places the administration's political goals and rhetoric above the needs of the Nation. The political goals come first, apparently, with this administration. What a shame. What a shame. The Office of Management and Budget has signaled that this year politics wins out over principle, rhetoric wins out over reality.

So much for the new tone the President was going to bring to Washington. All this administration wants to do, apparently, is to play the same old games. The administration seems to believe that the Federal Government is nothing more than a Monopoly board. The President is living on Park Place, but the rest of the country is relegated to Mediterranean Avenue. The administration has asserted that $768 billion is excessive spending for the coming fiscal year, and yet the significant increases within that total are to fund the President's proposal to significantly increase defense spending and homeland security funding.

I am not against doing whatever is needed to meet the Nation's requirements for defense, and the same is true with respect to homeland security. But the Nation should not be forced to cut budgets on health care, on education, on veterans programs, and other priorities here at home just to meet some political goal of the administration. The clock is ticking. We do not have time to play these political games.

There is more at stake than a simple roll of the dice.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article from the Wall Street Journal published on Monday, September 16, 2002. The title of the article is: "Bush Economic Aide Says Costs of Iraq War May Top $100 Billion."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUSH ECONOMIC AIDE SAYS COST OF IRAQ WAR MAY TOP $100 BILLION

(By Bob Davis)

WASHINGTON.—President Bush's chief economic advisor estimates that the U.S. may have to spend between $100 billion and $200 billion to wage a war in Iraq, but doubts that the hostilities would push the nation into recession or a sustained period of inflation.

Lawrence Lindsey, head of the White House's National Economic Council, projected the "upper bound" of war costs at between 1% and 2% of U.S. gross domestic product. With the U.S. GDP at about $10 trillion per year, that translates into a one-time cost of $100 billion to $200 billion. That is considerably higher than a preliminary, private Pentagon estimate of about $50 billion.

In an interview in his White House office, Mr. Lindsey dismissed the economic consequences of such spending, saying it wouldn't have an appreciable effect on interest rates or add much to the federal debt, which is already about $3.6 trillion. "One year" of additional spending? he said. "That's nothing."

At the same time, he doubted that the additional spending would give the economy much of a lift. "Government spending tends not to be that stimulative," he said. "Building weapons and expending them isn't the basis of sustained economic growth."

Administration officials have been unwilling to talk about the specific costs of a war, preferring to discuss the removal of Mr. Hussein in foreign-policy or even moral terms. Discussing the economics of the war could make it seem as if the U.S. were going to war over oil. That could sap support domestically and abroad, especially in the Mideast where critics suspect the U.S. of wanting to seize Arab oil fields.

Mr. Lindsey, who didn't provide a detailed analysis of the costs, drew an analogy between the potential war expenditures with an investment in the removal of a threat to the economy. "It's hard for me to see how we have sustained economic growth in a world where terrorists with weapons of mass destruction are running around," he said. If you weigh the cost of the war against the removal of a "huge drag on global economic growth for a foreseeable time in the future, there's no comparison."

Other administration economists say that their main fear is that an Iraq war could lead to a sustained spike in prices. The past four recessions have been preceded by the price of oil jumping to higher than $30 a barrel, according to BCA Research.com in Montreal. But the White House believes that removing Iraqi oil from production during a war—which would likely lead to a short-term rise in prices—would be insufficient to tip the economy into recession. What is worrisome, economists say, is if the war widens and another large Middle East supplier stops selling to the U.S., either because of an Iraqi attack or out of solidarity with Saddam Hussein's regime.

Mr. Lindsey said that Mr. Hussein's ouster could actually ease the oil problem by increasing supplies. Iraqi production has been constrained somewhat because of its limited investment and political factors. "When there is a regime change in Iraq, you could add three million to five million barrels of production to world supply" each day, Mr. Lindsey estimated. "The successful prosecution of the war would be good for the economy."

Currently, Iraq produces 1.7 million barrels of oil daily, according to OPEC figures. Before the Gulf War, Iraq produced around 3.5 million barrels a day.

Mr. Lindsey's cost estimate is higher than the $50 billion number offered privately by the Pentagon in its conversations with Congress. The difference shows the pitfalls of predicting the cost of a military conflict when nobody is sure how difficult or long it will be. Whatever the bottom line, the war's costs would be significant enough to make it harder for the Bush administration to climb out of the budget-deficit hole it faces because of the economic slowdown and expense of the war on terrorism.

Mr. Lindsey didn't spell out the specifics of the spending and didn't make clear whether he was including in his estimate the cost of rebuilding Iraq or installing a new regime. His estimate is roughly in line with the $58 billion cost of the Gulf War, which equaled about 1% of GDP in 1991. During that war, U.S. allies paid $48 billion of the cost, says William Hoagland, chief Republican staffer of the Senate Budget Committee.

This time it is far from clear how much of the cost—if any—America's allies would be willing to bear. Most European allies, apart from Britain, have been trying to dissuade Mr. Bush from launching an attack, at least without a United Nations resolution of approval. But if the U.S. decides to invade, it may be able to get the allies to pick up some of the tab if only to help their companies cash in on the bounty from a post-Saddam Iraq.

Toppling Mr. Hussein could be more expensive than the Persian Gulf War if the U.S. has to keep a large number of troops in the country to stabilize it once Mr. Hussein is removed from power. Despite the Bush administration's aversion to nation building, Gen. Tommy Franks, commander of U.S. troops in the Middle East and Central Asia, recently said that the U.S. troops in Afghanistan likely would remain for years to come. The same is almost certain to be true in Iraq. Keeping the peace among Iraq's fractious ethnic groups almost certainly will require a long-term commitment of U.S. troops.

During the Gulf War, the U.S. fielded 500,000 troops. A far smaller force is anticipated in a new attack on Iraq. But the GOP's Mr. Hoagland said the costs could be higher because of the expense of a new generation of smart missiles and bombs. In addition, the nature of the assault this time is expected to be different. During the Gulf War, U.S. troops bombed from above and sent tank-led troops in for a lightning sweep through the Iraqi desert. A new Iraq war could involve prolonged fighting in Baghdad and other Iraqi cities—even including house-to-house combat.

The Gulf War started with the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in August 1990, which prompted a brief recession. The U.S. started bombing Iraq on Jan. 16, 1991, and called a halt to the ground offensive at the end of February.

With Iraq's invasion, oil prices spiked and consumer confidence in the U.S. plunged.

But Mr. Lindsey said the chance of that happening again is "small." U.S. diplomats have been trying to get assurances from Saudi Arabia, Russia and other oil-producing states that they would make up for any lost Iraqi oil production. In addition, Mr. Lindsey said that the pumping equipment at the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve has been improved so oil is easier to tap, if necessary. Both the Bush and Clinton administrations, he said, wanted to "make sure you can pump oil out quickly."

On Thursday, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan said he doubted a war would lead to recession because of the reduced dependence of the U.S. economy on oil. "I don't think that . . . the effect of oil as it stands at this particular stage, is large enough to impact the economy unless the hostilities are prolonged," Mr. Greenspan told the House Budget Committee. "If we go through a time frame such as the Gulf War, it is unlikely to have a significant impact on us."

The U.S. economy also has become less dependent on oil than it was in 1990, said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Economy.com, an economic consulting group in West Chester, Pa. A larger percentage of economic activity comes from services, as compared with energy-intensive manufacturers, he said. Many of those manufacturers also use more energy-efficient machinery.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12:40 having arrived, the Senate will now stand in recess until the hour of 2:15 p.m.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 12:37 p.m., recessed until 2:15 p.m. and reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. EDWARDS).

HOMELAND SECURITY ACT OF 2002

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 2:15 p.m. having arrived, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 5005, which the clerk will report by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5005) to establish the Department of Homeland Security, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Lieberman amendment No. 4471, in the nature of a substitute.

Thompson/Warner amendment No. 4513 (to amendment No. 4471), to strike title II, establishing the National Office for Combating Terrorism, and title III, developing the National Strategy for Combating Terrorism and Homeland Security Response for detection, prevention, protection, response, and recover to counter terrorist threats.

Lieberman amendment No. 4534 (to amendment No. 4513), to provide for a National Office for Combating Terrorism, and a National Strategy for Combating Terrorism and the Homeland Security Response.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, under an order previously entered, it is my understanding the Senator from West Virginia has the floor; is that right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. Under the previous order, the Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I thank the distinguished Democratic whip.

Mr. President, I want to be sure that Senators understand the parliamentary situation in the Senate at this point.

Last Thursday, the Senate voted on a motion to table the Thompson amendment to strike Titles II and III of the Lieberman substitute. Title II would establish a new National Office for Combating Terrorism within the Executive Office of the President whose Director would be confirmed by the Senate and made accountable to the Congress.

That is incredibly important. The National Office for Combating Terrorism was viewed by our good colleague, Senator LIEBERMAN as a central part of his homeland security bill. Title II was carried over from his original bill that was introduced last May, before the White House endorsed the idea of creating a new Department of Homeland Security.

But the motion to table the Thompson amendment to strike Title II failed by a vote of 41-55 last Thursday. Senator LIEBERMAN conceded the victory to Senator THOMPSON, and urged the Senate to accept the "the next best idea." Senator LIEBERMAN offered a scaled down version of Titles II and III as a second degree amendment to the Thompson amendment.

It was at that point that I gained the floor and have held it until today.

So I find myself in a position that I had not intended—and not an easy position. I have often felt, in recent days, as if this 84-year-old man—soon to be 85; within a few days—is the only thing standing between a White House hungry for power and the safeguards in the Constitution. That is not bragging, that is lamenting.

This is not the way it ought to be. This will not go down as one of the Senate's shining moments. Historians will not look back at this debate and say that we fulfilled the role that was envisioned by the Framers.

This Senate should have the wisdom to stand for this institution and the Constitution. It is not our duty to protect the White House. It is our duty to protect the people—those people out there looking through their electronic lenses, the people who come here from day to day, these silent individuals who sit up here in the galleries. They do not have anything to say. They are not allowed to speak under the Senate rules, but they sit and watch us. They are looking over our shoulders, as it were, and they expect us to speak for them. They will help to ensure that the interests and the rights of the American people are protected. That is what these people want. They want us to assure that their interests—the people's interests—and the rights of the American people are protected.

I have been joined by a few voices on this floor in recent days, and I thank them. I feel that at least some Members are beginning to view this legislation as doing much more than merely setting up a new Department of Homeland Security.

I have also heard from citizens across the country who have urged me never to give up. Well, I can assure them that as long as I am privileged to serve in this body I will never give up defending the Constitution.

I heard Condoleezza Rice last Sunday, and I heard Dr. Rice the Sunday before.

I heard Secretary of State Powell last Sunday on television, and I heard him the Sunday before.

I have listened to Secretary Rumsfeld, and I have listened to Vice President CHENEY on television.

I have listened to various and sundry Senators on television. I have listened to various and sundry other spokespersons on television.

I read the op-ed piece of former Secretary of State Shultz in the newspaper Sunday a week ago.

I read the op-ed piece of former Secretary of State James Baker in the paper this past Sunday. And I hear many persons in the media—not everybody but some in the media—who seem to be intent upon galvanizing this and making this country ready for war. Not one of these people have I heard—maybe I missed it—refer to the Constitution. I take an oath, and so does every other Senator, to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic. Nobody says anything about the Constitution in this debate that is raging over the country.

There is a great fervor, and there is a great wave of opinion being created. And some in the media are doing it, or helping to create it. They have their minds made up. We are off to war.

I can hear the bugles, and I can see the flag. I can see the sunlight tinting on the bugles as they pass, and the flag I see going already. I can hear the guns. There is a great fervor here, and I hear the war drums being beaten. It is as though we have our minds made up. It is as though the President is already ready to go. And there is a developing hysteria in this country saying: Let us go to war. We have our minds made up.

Nobody stands up against that. But the Constitution is a barrier—this Constitution which I hold in my hand. This Constitution says Congress shall have the power to declare war. It doesn't say the President shall have power to declare war. It doesn't say the Secretary of State shall have power to declare war. Congress shall have power to declare war. But who is bothering to mention Congress? Who is bothering to mention the Constitution? It has become irrelevant, as far as some of the commentators and columnists and editorial writers are concerned, it seems to me. That is my impression. The Constitution has become just an old piece of paper. It was great 215 years ago but not now. Events have overtaken the Constitution. Nobody mentions it.

I haven't heard Dr. Condoleezza Rice mention it on her television appearances. I haven't heard the Secretary of State mention the Constitution. I haven't heard the Secretary of Defense mention the Constitution. I haven't heard the Vice President of the United States say a word about the Constitution when he discusses the business of going to war.

Has it become irrelevant? Are we to sit supinely by and be swept up in this national fervor that is being developed, that is being created to stampede this country into war? Are we to sit silently by?

Well, I want to assure the people that as long as I am privileged to serve in this body I will never give up defending the Constitution. And the Constitution is front and center to this business that we are discussing—the issue of war and peace. The Constitution is front and center.

Why, there are some who will get on the national television programs—they do not invite me; I don't expect them to mention the Constitution. Why is it? Why is that?

Here is the Vice President, the President of this body right here under the Constitution, who can't address the Senate except by unanimous consent, but when he is on national television on these programs, why doesn't he mention the Constitution? Is this Constitution irrelevant? They take for granted, I suppose, that the United Nations is the chief authorizer of America marching off to war.

I am for what the President did the other day. He went to the United Nations. He has pointed the finger, as it were, at the United Nations, and said the United Nations has been recreant in its duty and recreant in its responsibility to enforce its resolutions. I think he laid down an excellent case in making that point.

But we also have a duty here. We have a duty to uphold this Constitution and what it says about declaration of war and what it says about Congress.

Why, it is as though the Constitution is something that went away with the winds of yesterday—gone.

I can assure the people I will never give up defending this Constitution. It is my sworn duty. At some point, however, I will have to relinquish the floor. And when I do, the Lieberman amendment presumably will be withdrawn and the Senate will vote on the Thompson amendment. That amendment, I presume, would pass, and titles II and III of the Lieberman substitute will be stricken from the bill.

Senator LIEBERMAN may be right that we don't have the votes to defeat the Thompson amendment. But what disturbs me most of all is that such an important element of the Lieberman substitute could be stricken from the bill so easily.

I am talking about the need to confirm the Director of the National Office for Combating Terrorism. So I just refer to that title as the Director.

Now, I don't think we should accept that verdict so easily.

It is unbelievable to me that people are not fighting harder for these proposals, not only in title II and title III, but throughout the entire bill. The issues raised by this legislation are too important to languish without more debate in the Senate.

I know I am not the only Senator who is concerned about this bill, but I have not heard enough voices speaking out on these important matters. There are many, many unanswered questions which Senators need to focus on and explore.

Of course, I can't fight this battle alone.

Meanwhile, the President and the House Republican leadership are already turning up the heat on the Senate to pass this bill quickly. The President even suggests that delaying this bill will endanger the lives of the American people.

That is nice rhetoric, Mr. President, but I doubt whether anyone believes that argument. The people are not endangered by our thorough consideration of this legislation. The mistakes we avoid now are just as important as getting the Department in place quickly. What is not done well, generally, must be done over, and unintended consequences can take years to correct.

Nevertheless, pressures are building to expedite consideration of this bill. But in taking the floor, I hope to draw attention not only to the fallibility of passing this bill without a confirmable White House Homeland Security Director, but to other portions of this bill that should make Senators question the rush to enact this legislation so quickly.

My hope is that Senators will consider the gravity of this legislation before they simply jump on board somehow. This homeland security legislation will have important consequences not only for the lives of all Americans, but for the American way of life as well.

Mr. President, the security of the American people, on American soil, is, and has always been, our Government's most solemn responsibility. September 11 added a new dimension and urgency to that duty.

The bill before the Senate seeks to enhance our Government's ability to protect the American people from the devastation of another terrorist attack by creating a new Department of Homeland Security.

I have been for that. I was for that before President Bush was for it.

That is a very ambitious goal. It is a worthy and honorable goal born of commendable intentions. But if we do not move with great caution—if we do not slow down just a little bit—move with great caution—and deliberation in our work, we will risk undermining the very purpose to which we are dedicated.

My concerns about the proposed legislation are many. They are legion. While we can all embrace the concept of a new Department of Homeland Security, there are many, many pitfalls ahead for such an endeavor in the complicated new atmosphere of what has been called a "war" on terrorism.

I have made several comments about the threat that this new Department poses to the civil liberties—hear me now—to the civil liberties of the American people. And that is not just hyperbole.

Twenty-six leaders of conservative organizations across this country released a statement this month urging the Senate to exercise "restraint, caution, and deeper scrutiny before hastily granting unnecessary powers to a homeland security bureaucracy."

So, you see, that was not just ROBERT BYRD talking. That was not just an 84-year-old man, soon to be 85, talking.

Let me say that again. Twenty-six leaders of conservative—get that—conservative organizations across America released a statement this month urging the Senate to exercise—and I quote—"restraint, caution, and deeper scrutiny before hastily granting unnecessary powers to a homeland security bureaucracy."

They wrote that:

[T]he popular enthusiasm for such a centralization and bureaucratization in the name of homeland security may prove unwise. Proposed legislation not only increases the growth of the federal bureaucracy but establishes an infrastructure, legal and institutional, which, if abused, could lead to serious restrictions on the personal freedoms and civil liberties of all Americans.

In case there are any latecomers to hearing this Senate, just now, I am talking about 26 leaders of conservative organizations across America who released a statement this month urging the Senate to slow down. They wrote—and I quote again:

[T]he popular enthusiasm for such a centralization and bureaucratization in the name of homeland security may prove unwise. Proposed legislation not only increases the growth of the federal bureaucracy but establishes an infrastructure, legal and institutional, which, if abused, could lead to serious restrictions on the personal freedoms and civil liberties of all Americans.

"All Americans."

September 11 was a shock to this Nation, and the fear, anger, and alarm it engendered have not, as yet, vanished. My concern is that in our zeal to see to it that terrorists never again defile our homeland, we will unwittingly cede some of our precious freedoms and blur the constitutional safeguards that have been the basis for our liberties and the check against an overreaching executive for 215 years, or thereabouts.

Let me make it clear that I am not accusing anyone of deliberately trying to exploit our national tragedy.

Rather, I believe that in our shock and revulsion, our collective determination to prevent further horrific attacks may change our Nation in fundamental ways that will eventually surprise and dismay all of us. How terribly ironic it would be if it were our response to the treachery of al-Qaida which dealt our constitutionally guaranteed freedoms the most devastating blow of them all.

I believe that all of those in Government, those of us in Government who are challenged with confronting the horrible reality of what happened on September 11, have not, even yet, come to grips with certain fundamental realities. We must all begin to face certain truths.

Terrorism is a worldwide force, and our ability to prevent it at home or contain it abroad is limited—is limited—at best.

An enemy in the shadows, living among us and using our own openness and freedoms to attack our infrastructure, and to cripple and kill our citizens, is unlike any enemy we have ever before known.

No Government Department can ever guarantee complete safety from this kind of threat in a world increasingly connected by trade, travel, electronic communication, migrating populations and open borders. But, we can do our best to anticipate vulnerabilities, protect critical infrastructure, and respond to possible devastation or deliberately spread disease.

Yet, we can never be perfectly safe from the scourge of a terrorist attack. That is reality. And handing over our precious liberties and hard-won principles on such topics as worker rights, openness in government, the right to privacy and civil liberties—that is what is involved here—will not change that unfortunate and troubling reality. Such a course, blindly followed in the name of fighting terrorism, would be disastrous. Hear me. It is understandable that this administration, or any administration so consumed with the need to prevent another such horrific attack, might become so zealous and so focused on that mission that important freedoms could be trampled or relegated to a secondary position in our national life. If we are not vigilant, our country could be fundamentally changed before we realize it, in ways which we would all come to deeply regret.

Let me illustrate what I mean. Recent headlines have provided examples of the administration's strong penchant for secrecy, and its refusal to be confined by the law and the Constitution in its attempts to shield its actions from public scrutiny.

Last month, a Federal appeals court in Cincinnati issued a direct rebuke of attempts by the Administration to circumvent the Constitution—there is that magic word—by conducting deportation hearings in secret, whenever the government asserts that the object of the hearings might be linked to terrorism. Writing for the three-judge panel of the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals, Judge Damon J. Keith wrote, “A government operating in the shadow of secrecy stands in complete opposition to the society envisioned by the framers of our Constitution.”

The Justice Department has already conducted hundreds of these hearings out of sight of the press and the public. In doing so, the administration has been able to decide the fate of each of these individuals without recrimination.

It may be that all of these hearings were conducted properly and fairly, but there is just no way for us to know. Like so many other actions that this administration has taken on behalf of our safety, we have no way of knowing whether what they have done was the right thing to do. Nobody in this administration or anywhere else is all wise. We have no way of knowing whether the steps they have taken have really helped to secure our safety. And we have no way of knowing whether the actions they took may have threatened our own liberties.

The administration argued that secrecy is necessary for these hearings because subjecting them to public scrutiny would compromise its fight against terrorism.

The court's concurring opinion addressed the merits of the government's position, but it pointed out that a reasonable solution to the administration's concerns could be achieved by requiring the Government to demonstrate the need for secrecy in each hearing on a case-by-case basis.

Ultimately, the Court of Appeals saw the Government's argument for what it is; namely, a danger to our liberty. The court took the clear-headed, clear-eyed position that excessive secrecy in matters such as these compromises the very principles of free and open government that the fight against terror is meant to protect.

Even with the best of intentions to justify the Government's actions, our freedoms are easily trampled when officials are allowed to exercise the power of the Government without exposing their actions to the light of day.

As Judge Keith wrote, “Democracies die behind closed doors.”

We have also seen evidence in the news of what the executive branch is capable of when it is allowed to operate behind closed doors. On August 23, just last month, the front page of the Washington Post brought news of serious abuses of the laws that allow the Justice Department to conduct certain law enforcement activities in secret. Thank providence, thank heaven for a free press. That is what we want to keep. That is what we want to maintain—a free press.

The Washington Post article revealed that on May 17, a secret court that was created to oversee the Government's foreign intelligence activities rejected new rules proposed by the Department of Justice that would have expanded the ability of Federal investigators and prosecutors to operate in secret.

There you have it again—secret.

The Attorney General, John Ashcroft, wanted to tear down the walls between intelligence officials and law enforcement officials in the Department of Justice, allowing broad sharing of secret intelligence information among offices throughout the Department.

Mr. Ashcroft wanted to tear down these walls for a reason. The walls make it harder for his Department to circumvent the constitutional obstacles faced by his investigators in trying to hunt down terrorists. And like others in this administration, Mr. Ashcroft has little patience or concern for the Constitution now that he is a general in the President's “war on terror.”

I voted for Mr. Ashcroft. I am not one of those who opposed his nomination. I was one of the few on this side of the aisle who voted for Mr. Ashcroft's nomination. I have to say, I am disappointed. But Mr. Ashcroft is not alone. Take a look at this administration.

Haven't you heard of the shadow government? That came to light a while back. All of a sudden, like the prophet's gourd, it just grew up overnight. Here is this shadow government. I had not been told about it. After all, I am chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the Senate. I am not the top Democrat in the Senate, but I am the senior Democrat in the Senate. I hadn't been told anything about it. I am the President pro tempore of the Senate; in other words, the President, for the time being. If the Vice President is not in the chair, I am the President of the Senate. I hadn't been told anything about a shadow government.

Of course, I said time and time again how this great idea about a Homeland Security Department, at least the administration's great plans, suddenly sprang into existence, like Aphrodite, who sprang from the ocean foam, or like Minerva, who sprang from the forehead of Jove fully armed and fully clothed.

All of this was a secret. We didn't know anything about this thing hatched out of the bosom of the White House—this great plan hatched out by four individuals in the bowels of the White House. So this White House, this administration, has a penchant for secrecy.

I am not going to point the finger just at Mr. Ashcroft. I voted for him. On this side of the aisle, I voted for him. He used to serve in this body. But Mr. Ashcroft wanted to tear down these walls for a reason. I say again, the walls make it harder, as all walls do, to get wherever you are going. The walls make it harder for his Department, Mr. Ashcroft's Department, to circumvent, get around, the constitutional obstacles faced by his investigators in trying to hunt down terrorists.

He and others in this administration apparently have little patience and concern for the Constitution—here it is—now that he is a general in the President's war on terror. Today is September 17, 2002, in the year of Our Lord; this is the day, 215 years ago, when our forefathers signed their names, the framers of the Constitution signed their names on the Constitution. They had completed their work, which had begun back in May 1787, and they signed their names on this Constitution. This is the day. I will have more to say about that shortly.

But this secret court, which was created by Congress under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, recognized the danger of tearing down these protective walls. The act made it easier for Federal investigators to obtain evidence through wiretaps or physical searches when the evidence will be used for foreign intelligence purposes. Traditional criminal investigations require a higher standard for search warrants and wiretaps, to protect the constitutional rights of American citizens. By trying to tear down the wall between the two, the Attorney General was hoping to lower the bar for obtaining evidence for criminal investigations by expanding access to secret procedures used in foreign intelligence.

The wall between law enforcement and intelligence has always allowed for cooperation in specific instances. In fact, this is the first time in the history of this secret court that an administration's request has been rejected. But this cooperation has previously been allowed to prosecute people such as CIA mole Aldrich Ames, whose crime was inextricably linked to foreign intelligence. If this wall had fallen, the Justice Department would be allowed to secretly investigate almost anyone who made an international phone call.

It is well to remember that the Patriot Act, passed in the aftermath of September 11, already lowered the bar for bypassing due process, privacy, and individual freedom. The Justice Department argues that the Patriot Act also authorizes the elimination of the wall between intelligence and law enforcement.

Couple this momentum with a new Department primed to root out terrorism at home and abroad and a powerful new Secretary of Homeland Security with intelligence powers that cut across traditional lines of authority, and one can easily see the possibility for abuse and for excess. That is why I am standing on the floor—trying to draw the attention of the public, trying to capture the attention of my colleagues, and trying to capture the media's attention. This is what I am talking about.

In reacting to the court's ruling, the Justice Department said:

We believe that the court's action unnecessarily narrowed the Patriot Act and limited our ability to fully utilize the authority Congress gave us.

Get that. It is the phrase "fully utilize" that gives me some special pause. Powers granted to this administration must continue to be checked. Oh, I tell you, they need to be checked. The need for checks on administrative powers is not just hypothetical, it is not just constitutional; I wish more would pay attention to that aspect of it. It has been well documented by recent Executive actions.

The most disturbing part of the secret court opinion is the revelation that the Justice Department has already been abusing this secret process, including 75 specific instances cited by the court in which FBI, or Justice officials, provided false statements in their applications for wiretaps and search orders, including one application signed by then-FBI Director Louis B. Freeh.

The court cited these examples as evidence of the need to keep a close eye on the Department's activities in order to prevent an environment in which cooperation becomes subordinated to the law enforcement agenda of the Attorney General.

While some of the abuses identified by the court occurred during the administration of former President Clinton, rather than President Bush, the need for oversight applies to every administration.

My concerns are not just based on who may be in the White House at a particular moment. My concerns are based in the Constitution. These problems transcend administrations. Administrations may come and go, but the Constitution, like Tennyson's brook, goes on and on forever.

The war on terrorism must not be used by the executive branch—any executive branch. Mr. Bush certainly won't be in office forever. So one should look even beyond this administration, whatever the next administration will be. The war on terrorism must not be used by the executive branch as an excuse to ignore constitutional liberties behind closed doors and to destroy the delicate checks and balances that have made this Nation a great beacon for freedom to the world.

Congress is the leveler when it comes to precipitous actions. The Senate, in particular, is the place intended by the Framers for cooling off. A calm oasis where reason and cooler heads prevail against the heat of passion has always been found on the floor of the United States Senate, and I hope that we in this Chamber will again step up to that traditional calling as we consider this matter in these extraordinary times.

In an election year, all politicians like to claim we have an answer for even the Nation's most intractable problems, but in this case we underestimate the intelligence of the American people if we believe that merely offering them a new Department of Homeland Security will serve as currency to buy our way out of our continuing responsibilities under the Constitution.

The people know that such a Department is no panacea for protection of our homeland. They will never forgive us if we are lax in our duty to safeguard traditional freedoms and American values based on the Constitution as we rush to fashion a new Department, even though that Department is intended to protect the American people from the insidious danger of a virulent attack on our homeland.

In the name of homeland security, Congress must not be persuaded to grant broad authorities to the administration that, given more careful thought, we would not grant. The House has already passed legislation to grant the President the authority to waive worker protections for Federal employees, to place the new Department's inspector general under the thumb of the Homeland Security Secretary, to exempt the new Department from public disclosure laws, and to chip away at congressional control of the power of the purse.

Close examination of the President's plan shows that the administration is seeking more new powers which, unchecked, might be used to compromise the private lives of the American public.

Congress must never act so recklessly as to grant such broad statutory powers to any President, even in the quest for something so vital as protection of our own land. So vital, the war on terror. We must exercise great caution. We must operate with the clear knowledge that once such powers are granted, they will reside in the White House with future Presidents—Republican and Democrat—and they will not be easily retrieved.

So once such powers are granted, they will not be easily retrieved. They will reside in the White House. And everyone who knows anything about the Constitution and about our experience in the political arena, anybody who knows anything about that, knows that no future President will likely return those powers, likely give up those powers, once they have been granted, and a Presidential veto in the future will be very difficult to overcome, as such a veto is usually difficult to overcome. Once the powers go down that avenue to the other end, they are gone for a long time, and the only way they can be retrieved is by overriding a Presidential veto. And, of course, the Senators and everyone know that will require a two-thirds vote. It will not make a difference whether the President is Democrat, Republican, or Independent; He will want to keep those powers. So be careful about granting them now.

Both the House-passed bill and the Lieberman bill substitute broad new authority to the administration to create this new Department, but neither bill ensures that Congress remain involved. Neither the House bill nor the Lieberman bill ensure that Congress remain involved throughout the implementation of the legislation.

Senator LIEBERMAN's bill takes steps to ensure that Congress is informed as the Department assumes its duties, but under his bill this information comes to us only after the fact. It is not enough just to be told how the administration intends to use these statutory powers. Congress needs to retain some prerogatives so Congress can temper and shape the administration's exercise of these new authorities and so Congress can temper and shape the new Department's exercise of the new authority.

So Congress has the responsibility to make sure we do not grant broad statutory powers to the President and then just simply walk away from the new Department, trusting that the administration will exercise restraint. Congress must remain involved to ensure that the orderly implementation of the Department does not flounder and that important worker rights and civil liberties do not fall into the breach.

Government reorganization is nothing novel. We have had Government reorganization before. And we have from time to time found new agencies created in the spotlight of political pressure and then left to languish and go awry in the twilight of mundane and practical purpose. This could be a mistake.

This administration, since the September 11 attacks, has announced at least three major governmental reorganizations prior to the President's proposal to create a new Homeland Security Department.

Last December, in response to numerous media reports criticizing the Nation's porous borders, the administration proposed the consolidation of the Customs Service and the Immigration and Naturalization Service within the Justice Department.

Last March, following the mailing of two student visas by the Immigration and Naturalization Service to two of the September 11 hijackers 6 months after they crashed planes into the World Trade Center Towers, the administration announced the INS would be reorganized, split into a services bureau on the one hand and a separate enforcement bureau on the other.

Last May, following reports about intelligence failures by the FBI, the administration announced a reorganization of the FBI. These reorganizations have either produced very little or they have been replaced by subsequent additional reorganization proposals. It is as if we are spinning around in circles with little left to show for all of the energy expended but dizziness.

To avoid a similar fate to this new Department, I have an amendment to the Lieberman substitute that would ensure that the Congress continues to play a role. The Byrd amendment would create the superstructure of the new Department as outlined in the Lieberman bill, but would require Congress to pass separate, more detailed legislation to transfer the agencies, functions, and employees to it.

The Byrd amendment would not change the intent of the Lieberman bill. Let me say this, Senator LIEBERMAN is near the floor. I don't necessarily have to keep the floor for the next hour. I can under the order that had been entered. I get first recognition. But there is still an hour in this 2-hour period before the Senate goes back to the Interior appropriations bill. I welcome Mr. LIEBERMAN's questions. I am happy to discuss my amendment with him if he so desires before I give up the floor.

My amendment would immediately create a new Homeland Security Department. There it is. My amendment would create immediately a new Homeland Security Department. My amendment would immediately establish the superstructure of the six directorates outlined by the Governmental Affairs Committee. The Byrd amendment is not designed as an alternative to the Lieberman bill. I refer to it as the Lieberman bill. It is a bill that has been reported by the committee which Senator LIEBERMAN so ably chairs. So I refer to the bill as "the Lieberman bill." Its purpose is to strengthen. The purpose of my amendment is to strengthen the Lieberman bill. Its purpose is to ensure a strong Department capable of protecting our people. But its enactment would also ensure that the guiding hand of Congress would be there to help steer the course and stay the course.

What is more, any legislation submitted pursuant to this act would be referred to the Governmental Affairs Committee in the Senate so that my amendment, the Byrd amendment, would not deprive Senator LIEBERMAN or his committee of their jurisdiction or their expertise as we go about implementing this new Department which will have been created by the Lieberman bill. And, as I say, my amendment also creates that Department. My amendment allows the Department of Homeland Security to be established just as Senator LIEBERMAN envisioned. But the Byrd amendment would give Congress additional opportunities to sift through details concerning worker rights, civil liberties, secrecy, and various duties and functions. Equally important, it would ensure that the agencies and the offices to be transferred into the Department can continue to perform their important work of protecting the homeland while the groundwork is being laid for their move to the new Department.

Just recently we have all noted in the media that—I believe six persons were arrested in New York, in Buffalo, NY. Six persons were arrested. We didn't have any new Department of Homeland Security. There is no Department of Homeland Security that has been established. Yet the work of securing our homeland goes forward by the persons who man—man or woman, I use the word "man" to mean both women and men—the persons who are on the borders, who are guarding the ports of entry, who are looking at the huge containers that come into our ports, the persons who—right today and last night at midnight and all through the hours of this day, yesterday, the day before, and tomorrow—will continue to do their work even though there is no Department of Homeland Security. The FBI was on the job. The FBI has been on the job. And so the FBI brought about the arrest of these six persons, and they are being held.

So I say to the President and to anyone else: Nobody is holding up the work of proceeding with the security of our country. The people who will secure this Nation under a Homeland Security Department, if and when one is established, are the same people who are right now, right this day, securing the homeland. These people have been on the job last night, 6 months ago, and they continue to do this work. They have expertise. They have experience. They are trained, and so on. So nobody is holding up the security of the country. Nobody is holding that up. That is going forward, as was seen when the FBI arrested the six persons.

So this is vital. Ongoing reorganizations can foster chaos and destroy worker morale. Orderliness and careful thought while we transition can avoid overlooked vulnerabilities and missed nuances which could signal another disaster.

With the Byrd amendment, the Lieberman bill would transfer agencies and functions to the Department, one and two directorates at a time, beginning on February 3 of next year. This would then give Congress the opportunity to gauge and to monitor how the new Department is dealing with transition and what additional changes might be necessary. It would provide a means to quickly address the problems that will undoubtedly arise in the early phases of the Department's implementation and to guard against mistakes and missteps.

The Byrd amendment would not delay the implementation of the new Department one whit. It would actually expedite the implementation of the new Department by providing Congress with additional means to solve the quandaries that traditionally plague and delay and disrupt massive reorganizations.

Here we are talking about 170,000 employees. We are talking about 28 agencies and offices—some have said 30. So this is no minor movement. This is a major reorganization.

Moreover, the Congress could act to transfer agencies before the end of next year, roughly the same time period outlined by the Lieberman plan. When I say the Lieberman plan, I am talking about the bill that was adopted by the committee, which Mr. LIEBERMAN ably chaired. And that is the same time period outlined by the House bill. So who is holding up anything? Why shouldn't we stop, look, and listen here and do this thing in an orderly way? Do it right. Not necessarily do it now, do it here, but do it right. The Lieberman plan provides the President with a 1-year transition period, beginning 30 days after the date of enactment, effectively allowing up to 13 months before any agencies are transferred.

By then forcing the administration to come back to us—which the Byrd amendment would do—we can insist on knowing more about the plans of the administration with its penchant for secrecy—plans which are now only hazy outlines. So if Congress passes the Lieberman proposal or if Congress passes the House proposal, Congress will just be turning the thing over to the administration, lock, stock and barrel, and saying: Here it is, Mr. President. You take it. You have 13 months in which to do this, but it is all yours. Congress will just go off to the sidelines. Congress will have muzzled itself.

Whereas in the Byrd plan, the Byrd plan would also transfer these agencies. It would create a Homeland Security Department, and it would provide for the transaction, the movement of these various agencies, their personnel and their assets, into the new Department over the same period, 13 months, but it would do it in an orderly process in an orderly way, phased in, with Congress staying front and center and continuing to conduct oversight in this massive reorganization.

We must insist on assurances that in granting more powers to this administration and to future administrations to investigate terrorism, we are not also granting powers to jeopardize the rights, privacy, or privileges of law-abiding citizens.

We must insist on assurances that the constitutional rights of Americans remain protected. We must insist that the constitutional control of the purse by the Congress is not compromised.

We must insist on assurances that Government reorganization will not be used as a convenient device to dismantle time-honored worker protections.

We must insist on the preservation of our Government's constitutional system of checks and balances and separation of powers. We have a responsibility to do our very best as a nation to get this thing right. If we are going to create a new Department, let's get it right.

We have a responsibility to ourselves and to future generations to ensure that, in our zeal to build a fortress against terrorism, we are not dismantling the fortress of our organic law—our Constitution—our liberties, and our American way of life.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIGNING OF THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, as I stated earlier, today is September 17, the 215th anniversary of the signing of the Constitution in 1787. The Constitution is not noted for its soaring rhetoric or for the emotional power of its language, but it is nonetheless the most important document in our Nation's history.

Bar none, this Constitution that I hold in my hand is the most important document in our Nation's history. And it was meant, according to that eminent jurist John Marshall, to endure for ages—ages. It is not irrelevant. This is relevant. This Constitution is relevant. It is, front and center, relevant to today's issues.

The Declaration of Independence—which is also contained in this little book which I hold in my hand—with its ringing phrases, may have been a turning point in history, having laid out the case for breaking our ties with the Crown and setting us on the path to rebellion and liberty. There is no question in my mind but that it was a turning point.

But the Constitution is the foundation upon which our subsequent history was built. In its plain speech, it forms the blueprint for an entirely new form of government never before seen in history and, to my mind, not yet matched by any other.

I am happy to call attention to this day—to the anniversary of the signing of the Constitution.

As the Senate has been debating the homeland security bill, I have several times raised constitutional concerns about the way the homeland security bill is structured. In doing so, I have often felt like a voice crying out in the wilderness. Like a tree falling with no one to hear it, I have wondered if I was in fact making any progress and wondered if I was making any sound while I was talking. Was I making any sound?

I hope my colleagues and the American people will look at the Constitution, and I hope they will read it and they will study it. It is not long. It is not a huge volume. It doesn't contain many pages, and it isn't difficult to understand. But each time I read it, it seems I always find something new. It is like my reading of the Bible. It is like my reading of Shakespeare. I always find what seems to be something new.

The Constitution is not written in fancy, lawyerlike phrases, or flowery 18th century language. Every citizen was meant to understand it and to participate in the exercise of government—that being the surest defense against tyranny.

It is much like the Magna Carta, which indeed is a taproot, and beyond—a taproot from which liberty sprang and a taproot from which our Constitution sprang—the Magna Carta, a great charter, the charter of the English people, which was signed by King John on June 15, 1215. That was simple, but it was easily understood. It was written for ordinary people to understand, and it has been read and reread by millions through the centuries.

So read the Constitution. Look to history. I believe my concerns will be shared.

Article I of the Constitution outlines the powers of the legislature. It vests with the Congress the power to make laws. There it is. The first section of the first article says that all legislative powers herein are vested in the Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives. There it is—the power to make laws, the powers of the legislature.

Also, article I of the Constitution sets forth the qualifications and means of selecting representatives and the basic requirements for congressional operations.

Therein one will find in section 2 where the Constitution sets forth the creation of the House of Representatives, and then section 3 of the Constitution lays down the precepts and terms and the basis for the creation of the Senate.

The Constitution is a user manual for Congress, the operating software of the legislative branch. Article I, section 8, is the critical list of congressional powers, including subsection 18 which grants to Congress the power:

To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

You heard it here. Powers may be vested by the Constitution in the Government and its Departments or officers. But the Congress must pass the necessary laws for those powers to be exercised. It is meant to be a cooperative affair, with Congress playing a critical role.

Further, in section 9, subsection 7, of article I, the Constitution states that:

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

Congress again plays a critical role in providing funds for Government operations, and requires that the public be kept informed about how those funds are spent.

One can trace our Nation's history going back into the centuries and can trace these powers in the colonial governments, in the representative assemblies of the Colonies. The people in the Colonies had faith in their representative assemblies. Going back to the history of England, this has often been referred to as the "motherland."

Of course, we all know that the Spanish populated various areas in the South and Southwest, St. Augustine, and New Mexico, and other areas. But the individuals who wrote the Constitution, who met in Philadelphia, were British subjects. Some of them were born in the British Isles. They were English-speaking individuals. They knew about the history of Englishmen, how the English had struggled to secure the rights of the people, the power of the purse, to secure the control of the public purse for Parliament.

They knew that Parliament was created in the early 1300s during the reigns of Edward the First, Second, and Third. And they knew that the power of the purse had been lodged over a long period of centuries in Commons. That was made very clear by the English Bill of Rights which was enacted by Parliament in 1689.

So there it was, the power of the purse, lodged in the hands of the people's elected Representatives in Commons and now in Congress.

So Congress, as I say, plays a critical role in providing funds for Government operations, and the public must be kept informed about how those funds are spent.

Part of that process, as I have indicated, by long tradition, has occurred during the testimony of Government officials before the Congress regarding their budget requests and the manner in which previous appropriations have been spent. In the case of the proposed Department of Homeland Security, with its 170,000 employees and its enormous budget, such openness is equally to be expected, and should be demanded, by the taxpaying public.

Article II of the Constitution concerns the establishment of the Chief Executive, concerns the powers of the President, the qualifications and means of selecting the President, and his oath of office being required. Article II, section 2, subsection 2 notes that the President:

shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law . . .

Well, Madam President, that would seem clearly to include the proposed Director of Homeland Security will be certainly one to whom the provision in the Constitution is addressing, except that the subsection continues:

but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

If the Congress does not wish to provide for accountability or wish to have any voice in the selection of important Government officials, the Congress must take deliberate action to divest itself of its constitutional role in the operations of Government.

The authors of the Constitution clearly foresaw the growth of Government and recognized that the Congress could consume itself in processing the appointments of hundreds of minor officials. However, I sincerely doubt that these wise men would expect that a cabinet level official heading up an enormous department with a mission of grave importance to the Nation would receive less scrutiny and less oversight than so many officials whose positions do not involve the defense of our vital domestic security. That does not make sense. It is not logical. It is ludicrous. The Senate would not provide its advice and consent in the selection of the Director of Homeland Security, while Assistant Secretaries and Deputy Assistant Secretaries in other Departments are subject to confirmation? I cannot believe that the Senate cares less for the Department of Homeland Security and its Director than it does for so many other Government officials with smaller budgets and more narrow portfolios.

No, Madam President, I can only surmise that any willingness on the part of the Senate to abrogate its constitutional responsibilities and powers comes from a lack of attention to the deceptively plain language of the Constitution itself. Perhaps we should gussie it up, wrap it legalistic bells and whistles, enshroud it in "wheras-es" and "let it therefore be resolved" clauses, so that it receives the respect that it deserves. But, in fact, even Article III, concerning the judicial power of the United States, has no highfaluting lawyer words. Article IV, concerning the powers of the States; Article V, the process by which the Constitution may be amended; Article VI, making the Constitution the supreme law of the land, and Article VII, regarding ratification—none of these short Articles contains any obscure, opaque, misleading, or confusing language. Really, considering how many lawyers were involved in the drafting of the Constitution—a little more than half of the delegates to the Constitutional Convention were lawyers—it is a model of clarity and clean writing.

Indeed, the men who drafted the Constitution were as much heroes as those who signed the Declaration of Independence, making themselves known as traitors and wanted men in England, traitors to the Crown. They were treasonous. They committed treason. And they could have been hunted down and sent off to England and been executed. The Framers of the Constitution undertook a mighty task. They had to preserve the Nation's hard-won freedom by correcting the flaws in the Articles of Confederation that made the Nation weak and vulnerable to attack from without and rebellion from within. Drawing upon the lessons of history and the ideals of the Enlightenment, they set themselves the job of devising a novel form of government that could encompass the great diversity of the new Nation—from the mercantile North to the slaveholding South, from the settled East to the frontier West, with citizens from cultures around the globe.

In Philadelphia, in the hot summer of 1789, after lengthy and contentious debate, after considering and rejecting proposal after proposal, and after nearly 600 separate votes, they produced the miracle that is our Constitution. And so there you have it. In over 200 years, it has been amended 27 times, and 10 of the 27 amendments were ratified early on, by 1791.

In today's computer-minded lexicon, the Constitution is the mother board without which our thinking, evolving, machine of Government could not function. It is the enduring standard operating system, running the complex interactive software of national life. It is our embedded code, and when we overwrite it without careful consideration, we may well be planting the worms of our own destruction.

When the Executive acquires too much power and freedom of action unchecked by the balancing powers and oversight of the legislative branch, our careful system of checks and balances is in danger of being corrupted.

So on this anniversary of the signing of the Constitution, we would do well to revisit this miracle of compromise and foresight. We would do well to marvel at the abilities of the men who crafted this document. We would do well to rededicate ourselves to its careful preservation that it might see us through another two centuries and more.

Our fathers in a wondrous age,
Ere yet the Earth was small,
Ensured to us an heritage,
And doubted not at all

That we, the children of their heart,
Which then did beat so high,
In later time should play like part
For our posterity.

Then fretful murmur not they gave
So great a charge to keep,
Nor dream that awestruck time shall save
Their labour while we sleep.

Dear-bought and clear, a thousand year
Our fathers' title runs.
Make we likewise their sacrifice.
Defrauding not our sons.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Washington Post titled "Secret Court Rebuffs Ashcroft," to which I have already referred, and the New York Times op-ed titled "Secrecy Is Our Enemy," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRET COURT REBUFFS ASHCROFT

(By Dan Egen and Susan Schmidt)

The secretive federal court that approves spying on terror suspects in the United States has refused to give the Justice Department broad new powers, saying the government had misused the law and misled the court dozens of times, according to an extraordinary legal ruling released yesterday.

A May 17 opinion by the court that oversees the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) alleges that Justice Department and FBI officials supplied erroneous information to the court in more than 75 applications for search warrants and wiretaps, including one signed by then-FBI Director Louis J. Freeh.

Authorities also improperly shared intelligence information with agents and prosecutors handling criminal cases in New York on at least four occasions, the judges said.

Given such problems, the court found that new procedures proposed by Attorney General John D. Ashcroft in March would have given prosecutors too much control over counterintelligence investigations and would have effectively allowed the government to misuse intelligence information for criminal cases, according to the ruling.

The dispute between the Justice Department and the FISA court, which has raged behind closed doors until yesterday, strikes at the heart of Ashcroft's attempts since Sept. 11 to allow investigators in terrorism and espionage to share more information with criminal investigators.

Generally, the Justice Department must seek the FISA court's permission to give prosecutors of criminal cases any information gathered by the FBI in an intelligence investigation. Ashcroft had proposed that criminal-case prosecutors be given routine access to such intelligence information, and that they be allowed to direct intelligence investigation as well as criminal investigation.

The FISA court agreed with other proposed rule changes. But Ashcroft filed an appeal yesterday over the rejected procedures that would constitute the first formal challenge to the FISA court in its 23-year history, officials said.

"We believe the court's action unnecessarily narrowed the Patriot Act and limited our ability to fully utilize the authority Congress gave us," the Justice Department said in a statement.

The documents released yesterday also provide a rare glimpse into the workings of the almost entirely secret FISA court, composed of a rotating panel of federal judges from around the United States and, until yesterday, had never jointly approved the release of one of its opinions. Ironically, the Justice Department itself had opposed the release.

Stewart Baker, former general counsel of the National Security Agency, called the opinion a "a public rebuke."

"The message is you need better quality control," Baker said. "The judges want to ensure they have information they can rely on implicitly."

A senior Justice Department official said that the FISA court has not curtailed any investigations that involved misrepresented or erroneous information, nor has any court suppressed evidence in any related criminal case. He said that many of the misrepresentations were simply repetitions of earlier errors, because wiretap warrants must be renewed every 90 days. The FISA court approves about 1,000 warrants a year.

The department discovered the misrepresentation and reported them to the FISA court beginning in 2000.

Enacted in the wake of the domestic spying scandals of the Nixon era, the FISA statute created a secret process and secret court to review requests to wiretap phones and conduct searches aimed at spies, terrorists and other U.S. enemies.

FISA warrants have been primarily aimed at intelligence-gathering rather than investigating crimes. But Bush administration officials and many leading lawmakers have complained since Sept. 11 that such limits hampered the ability of officials to investigate suspected terrorists, including alleged hijacking conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui.

he law requires agents to be able to show probable cause that the subject of the search is an agent of a foreign government or terrorist group, and authorizes strict limits on distribution of information because the standards for obtaining FISA warrants are much lower than for traditional criminal warrants.

In Moussaoui's case, the FBI did not seek an FISA warrant to search his laptop computer and other belongings in the weeks prior to the Sept. 11 attacks because some officials believed that they could not adequately show the court Moussaoui's connection to a foreign terrorist group.

The USA Patriot Act, a set of anti-terrorism measures passed last fall, softened the standards for obtaining intelligence warrants, requiring that foreign intelligence be a significant, rather than primary, purpose of the investigation. The FISA court said in its ruling that the new law was not relevant to its decision.

Despite its rebuke, the court left the door open for a possible solution, noting that its decision was based on the existing FISA statute and that lawmakers were free to update the law if they wished.

Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have indicated their willingness to enact such reforms but have complained about resistance from Ashcroft. Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said yesterday's release was a "ray of sunshine" compared to a "lack of cooperation" from the Bush administration.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), another committee member, said the legal opinion will "help us determine what's wrong with the FISA process, including what went wrong in the Zacarias Moussaoui case. The stakes couldn't be higher for our national security at home and abroad."

The ruling, signed by the court's previous chief, U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth, was released by the new presiding judge, U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly.

FBI and Justice Department officials have said that the fear of being rejected by the FISA court, complicated by disputes such as those revealed yesterday, has at times caused both FBI and Justice officials to take a cautious approach to intelligence warrants.

Until the current dispute, the FISA court had approved all but one application sought by the government since the court's inception. Civil libertarians claim that record shows that the court is a rubber stamp for the government; proponents of stronger law enforcement say the record reveals a timid bureaucracy only willing to seek warrants on sure winners.

The opinion itself—and the court's unprecedented decision to release it—suggest that relations between the court and officials at the Justice Department and the FBI have frayed badly.

FISA applications are voluminous documents, containing boilerplate language as well as details specific to each circumstance. The judges did not say the misrepresentations were intended to mislead the court, but said that in addition to erroneous statements, important facts have been omitted from some FISA applications.

In one case, the FISA judges were so angered by inaccuracies in affidavits submitted by FBI agent Michael Resnick that they barred him from ever appearing before the court, according to the ruling and government sources.

Referring to the "the troubling number of inaccurate FBI affidavits in so many FISA applications," the court said in its opinion: "In virtually every instance, the government's misstatements and omissions in FISA applications and violations of the Court's orders involved information sharing and unauthorized disseminations to criminal investigators and prosecutors."

The judges were also clearly perturbed at a lack of answers about the problems from the Justice Department, which is still conducting an internal investigation into the lapses.

"How these misrepresentations occurred remains unexplained to the court," the opinion said.

SECRECY IS OUR ENEMY

(By Bob Herbert)

You want an American hero? A real hero? I nominate Judge Damon J. Keith of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

Judge Keith wrote an opinion, handed down last Monday by a three-judge panel in Cincinnati, that clarified and reaffirmed some crucially important democratic principles that have been in danger of being discarded since the terrorist attacks last Sept. 11.

The opinion was a reflection of true patriotism, a 21st-century echo of a pair of comments made by John Adams nearly two centuries ago. "Liberty," said Adams, "cannot be preserved without a general knowledge among the people."

And in a letter to Thomas Jefferson in 1816, Adams said, "Power must never be trusted without a check."

Last Monday's opinion declared that it was unlawful for the Bush administration to conduct deportation hearings in secret whenever the government asserted that the people involved might be linked to terrorism.

The Justice Department has conducted hundreds of such hearings, out of sight of the press and the public. In some instances the fact that the hearings were held was kept secret.

The administration argued that opening up the hearings would compromise its fight against terrorism. Judge Keith, and the two concurring judges in the unanimous ruling, took the position that excessive secrecy compromised the very principles of free and open government that the fight against terror is meant to protect.

The opinion was forceful and frequently eloquent.

"Democracies die behind closed doors," wrote Judge Keith.

He said the First Amendment and a free press protect the "people's right to know" that their government is acting fairly and lawfully. "When government begins closing doors," he said, "it selectively controls information rightfully belonging to the people. Selective information is misinformation."

He said, "A government operating in the shadow of secrecy stands in complete opposition to the society envisioned by the framers of our Constitution."

The concurring judges were Martha Craig Daughtrey and James G. Carr. The panel acknowledged—and said it even shared—"the government's fear that dangerous information might be disclosed in some of these hearings." But the judges said when that possibility arises, the proper procedure for the government would be to explain "on a case-by-case basis" why the hearing should be closed.

"Using this stricter standard," wrote Judge Keith, "does not mean that information helpful to terrorists will be disclosed, only that the government must be more targeted and precise in its approach."

A blanket policy of secrecy, the court said, is unconstitutional.

The case that led to the panel's ruling involved a Muslim clergyman in Ann Arbor, Mich., Rabi Haddad, who overstayed his tourist visa. The ruling is binding on courts in Kentucky, Michigan, Ohio and Tennessee and may serve as a precedent in other jurisdictions.

The attorneys who argued the case against the government represented four Michigan newspapers and Representative John Conyers Jr., a Michigan Democrat. They took no position on whether Mr. Haddad should be deported.

"Secrecy is the evil here," said Herschel P. Fink, a lawyer who represented The Detroit Free Press. He said the government "absolutely" had an obligation to "vigorously" fight terrorism. But excessive secrecy, he said, was intolerable.

"We just want to watch," said Mr. Fink.

Judge Keith specifically addressed that issue. The people, he said, had deputized the press "as the guardians of their liberty."

The essence of the ruling was the reaffirmation of the importance of our nation's system of checks and balances. While the executive branch has tremendous power and authority with regard to immigration issues and the national defense, it does not have carte blanche.

Lee Gelernt, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union who represented some of the plaintiffs in the case, noted that the administration has been arguing since Sept.

11 that it needs much more authority to act unilaterally and without scrutiny by the public and the courts.

He said last week's ruling was the most recent and, thus far, the most important to assert, "That's not the way it's done in our system."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CARNAHAN). The majority leader.

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I will be brief. The President again today admonished the Senate for moving slowly on homeland security. He again told his audience that he was very concerned that we are moving slowly on an issue of great import in terms of his design on homeland security and the need for a recognition of national security through this legislation.

Let me simply say to the President and to anybody else who has question: There is no desire to slow down this legislation. There are Senators who have very significant concerns about various provisions, but there ought to be no question about our desire to continue to work to complete the deliberation of this legislation and send it to conference as quickly as possible.

We have only had an opportunity to debate one amendment and bring it to closure. It would be my hope we could take up Senator BYRD's amendment sometime very soon and we could take up other amendments to the legislation as soon as possible. We have now been on this bill for 3 weeks, and I understand why some would be concerned about the pace with which the Senate is dealing with this legislation.

I discussed the matter with Senator LOTT, and I think he shares my view that we have to move the bill along. I note that if the President had supported homeland security legislation when the Democrats first offered it last summer, we probably would have completed it by now. It took them about 2 months to respond to the actions taken by the Governmental Affairs Committee in the Senate. But that has been done. They have responded, and we have worked with them to come up with a plan of which we are very proud and a product that can be addressed.

Senator BYRD has a good amendment. There are others who have amendments as well, but the time has come to move on. I had originally hoped we could get an agreement that only relevant amendments would be offered. We have not had a case of nonrelevant amendments. We have had a case of no amendments in this process. It is very important for us to demonstrate to the American people, it is very important for us to make as clear as we can that we want to come to closure on this legislation—take up amendments and deal with them effectively, but the amendments ought to be germane and we ought to work within a timeframe.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, with respect to the Lieberman substitute amendment to the homeland security bill, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I ask the leader if he will add my name to that cloture motion.

Mr. DASCHLE. I will be happy to add the Senator's name.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I give the distinguished majority leader my power of attorney to sign this for me. Everybody in the country knows about my trembling hands. So I hope the majority will sign this for me.

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that I have that right, and we will accommodate the Senator's request. I appreciate very much his support of the cloture motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close the debate on the Lieberman substitute amendment No. 4471 for H.R. 5005, Homeland Security legislation.

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, we now have two cloture motions before the Senate. The first one ripens this afternoon at 5:15. That is on the amendment offered by Senator BYRD to the Interior appropriations bill.

We cannot get to the rest of the business before us unless that cloture motion is agreed to. There can be no excuse, there can be no reason, after all this debate, after all the meetings, that we cannot at least bring closure to that amendment.

Senators still have a right to offer amendments to the bill, but we have to move on. I cannot imagine that there would be a Senator who would want to extend debate beyond the 3 weeks we have now debated Interior and the Byrd amendment. The same could be said of homeland security. If we want to respond to the President, who again today said the time for the Senate to act is now, let's respond on a bipartisan basis and let's vote for cloture on the Lieberman substitute and let's move this legislation along.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. CANTWELL). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Madam President, I have sought recognition to comment briefly about the upcoming cloture vote and also about the status of our progress on the homeland security bill and the progress of the Senate on its fundamental responsibility to have a budget or make appropriations.

I would have thought that on September 17, the day the Constitution was ratified, there would be more regard for the constitutional responsibility of the Senate. We have the power of appropriation, but we are not handling our duties. Much as I dislike saying so, I believe the Senate is dysfunctional. Harsh, perhaps, but true, certainly. We are simply not getting the job done.

I am a little surprised to see a cloture motion filed on an amendment to an appropriations bill. If there were protracted debate, if there were an effort to stall, if there were some attempt made to delay the proceedings of the Senate, perhaps so. But there are Senators who want to vote on an important issue relating to the forests, especially in the West, and the dangers of fire. They have been seeking a vote but have not been able to get one.

I intend to vote against cloture, to give Senators a chance to present their amendment. That is not to say I will support the amendment, but I believe the Senators ought to have an opportunity to present their amendment.

Cloture has now been filed on the homeland security bill. We are now in our third week after returning from the August recess, and the Senate has done virtually nothing during that period of time. We have had prolonged speeches on generalizations which have, in fact, impeded the progress of the homeland security bill. We were in a position to vote on the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut last Thursday, but it could not get a vote because the time was consumed with speechmaking. Now, I like speechmaking as much as the next Senator, but there has to be some balance as to what is being done. And again this afternoon—I had not known unanimous consent was granted—more lengthy speeches, without really getting to the substance of what the Senate ought to be doing.

We have not passed any appropriations bill among the 13 we are charged with passing. Now, this is September 17, 13 days away from the end of the fiscal year, with only a few working days left. The Department of Defense appropriations bill lies dormant. It has been passed by both bodies, but there hasn't been a conference. The military construction appropriations bill lies dormant. Again, it has been passed by both bodies but there hasn't been a conference.

We are fighting a war at the present time. We are cleaning up the remnants of other wars, in Kosovo and in Bosnia, and our troops are in Afghanistan. We will be called upon soon to vote on a resolution which may send us to war against Iraq.

Now, what are we doing for the Department of Defense? We have a very substantial increase in defense funding, but the way it looks now, we are going to be having a continuing resolution. What the House has said ought to be adopted and what the Senate has said ought to be adopted will be curtailed very drastically if we have a continuing resolution. So we are simply not doing our job.

Then we have 11 other appropriations bills. I have the responsibility, as ranking member of the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, to prepare a very major bill which funds the Department of Education, the major capital investment of America, the Department of Health and Human Services, which is very important, and the Department of Labor on worker safety. But we are not moving to pass the bill.

The National Institutes of Health, probably the best investment this Congress makes, the crown jewel of the Federal Government—perhaps the only jewel of the Federal Government—has an increase of $3.5 billion in this year's appropriations bill. But as of this reading, it is unlikely to comment on its operation because we are not going to pass the bill.

We are told that the Department of Defense appropriations bill is being held up because we have not established the allocations. Why haven't we established allocations? We haven't established allocations because there is no budget. The Budget Act was passed in 1974, and this is the first year there hasn't been a budget passed.

As I am approaching the end of my 22nd year in this body, not an inconsiderable period of time, I have not seen the Senate in such disarray as we are at the present time.

We had a vote several weeks ago on what was the equivalent of deeming. That is legal jargon, Senate jargon, for making out as if we had passed a budget to establish a figure. It required 60 votes to have this amendment passed—I was sorely tempted to vote for it—which would have established the Senate budget $9 billion above the House budget. I do believe we need a budget, because if we do not, we are going to be passing appropriations bills which far exceed the purported allocations.

It is customary, on the attractive education proposals and the attractive health proposals, to get into the high fifties. With a 60-vote requirement, those amendments are not passed, but they are very tempting amendments. When I responded to the rollcall, with 59 Senators having voted aye on the deeming resolution, I just was not going to do it, notwithstanding my deep commitment to the appropriations process and notwithstanding my knowledge that it was fairly important to have a budget figure.

But if we are going to use a shortcut, if we are going to use a substitute, what is the point of having a budget resolution? If the Budget Committee knows it can be derelict in its duty and be bailed out by 60 Senators who will say, awe, shucks, let's go ahead and do it anyway, what is the point to have the Budget Committee do its job next year or any year?

The previous chairman of the Budget Committee told me—the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico is sitting in front of me—that he will be chairman next year. If I was sure of that, I would have voted for deeming. But I am not sure of much of anything on the current posture.

So it is my hope that we will move ahead and have votes and let there be a vote on this issue on the course. But let us proceed to vote on the homeland security issues which are very important.

One of the critical issues on homeland security, in my judgment, is to have the analysis of all the agencies—FBI, CIA, NSA—under one umbrella.

Had that been done prior to September 11, 2001, I think that catastrophe might have been avoided. There were lots of danger signals. There were lots of dots on the board.

There was the July FBI Phoenix memorandum about a man taking flight training and two al-Qaida men in Kuala Lumpur, known to the CIA, who later turned out to be pilots on the hijacked planes. The CIA didn't bother to tell the FBI or INS.

You had the NSA warning on September 10 that something was going to happen the next day. But nobody bothered to translate it until September 12.

Then you had the matter of Zacarias Moussaoui, a much celebrated personality today with the litigation in the Federal court. But had the FBI obtained a warrant under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, there was a treasure trove of information linking Moussaoui to al-Qaida. And there was a virtual blueprint, had all the dots been put together.

After September 11, I opposed the creation of an independent commission because it seemed to me the Intelligence Committees could do the job. I understood that they couldn't move ahead immediately with hearings in closed session and then in open session in order to give the intelligence community an opportunity to regroup. But that time has long passed, and now we find the Intelligence Committees are embroiled in another investigation; that is, an investigation by the FBI against the Intelligence Committees.

It is very difficult to understand how the Intelligence Committees can be investigating the FBI and the CIA and other intelligence agencies, and then, having a leak of classified material, to have the FBI investigate the intelligence committees. I wrote to the chairmen and vice chairmen of both the House and Senate, strongly urging them not to do that—that you simply can't have investigators being investigated by those who are under investigation.

Then you have the issue of separation of powers. If the FBI is going to be able to investigate the Congress, what independence does the Congress have in our oversight function?

So the Intelligence Committees have not moved ahead for that job. The only alternative now is an independent commission. I worked as one of the younger lawyers on the Warren Commission staff many years ago. I say "younger lawyer" because I am still a young lawyer. And, while the Warren Commission has received a fair amount of critical analysis over the years, the essential conclusions have held up—that Oswald was the sole assassin, or the single bullet that went through both the President and Governor Connolly and the President was struck by a later bullet which killed him. So I have now come to conclude that we need an independent commission.

But most of all we need a Senate which will move ahead in its duties and obligations. This is a good day, September 17. September 17, 1787, was the day the Constitution was signed. So, 215 years later, that ought to be a hallmark for us to move ahead and discharge our duties.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, I was en route here and was watching and saw the Senator from Pennsylvania speaking. I got here as fast as I could because I was wondering when somebody would say what he has said. Frankly, I am sorry the distinguished President pro tempore is not here, or I would ask him the same question: When do we intend? When would he let us vote on this very important, new Cabinet position and the Cabinet organization that goes with it?

I heard much of what he wants to say. I know he wants to win. But I believe it is important that when we are at war, we proceed with some dispatch to give the President what he wants. If the distinguished Senator is going to lose, we all lose sometimes. If he is going to win, maybe he will win sooner than he thinks. But it is taking a long time and getting nowhere. And I think we know the issues on that new piece, that new Department of our Federal Government. I think he ought to let us proceed with it.

My further observation has to do with appropriations. You know, we are all tied in knots because we didn't get a budget resolution, and every time we say it, somebody should be here on our side of the aisle because it is not our fault. It is not me as ranking member. It is not my fault. And it is not my fault in any other capacity. I have been on that committee for 25 years, and never did I not get a budget resolution when I was chairman. One way or another, we got a budget resolution.

Now we don't know which appropriations numbers to follow, the bigger number in the House or the Senate or vice versa. At least that much would be resolved with a budget resolution. I hope we learn from it and we get on to our business today.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam, President, my amendment, No. 4554, would establish an Office of National Capital Region Coordination within a newly-created Department of Homeland Security. Joining me in offering this amendment are Senators WARNER, MIKULSKI, and ALLEN.

The September 11, 2001 terrorist attack on the Pentagon underscored the unique challenges the National Capital Region faces in emergency preparedness. A recent editorial in the Washington Post perhaps described the problem best:

Sept. 11 laid bare the truth about the national capital region's preparedness for a major terrorist attack. That fateful day revealed that the area's 5 million residents, the federal government's far-flung operations and the varied state and local jurisdictions were ill-prepared for the kind of emergencies that could result from bioterrorism or other murderous terrorist strikes . . . . It will be no easy feat, converting a region containing three branches of the federal government, two states, and the District of Columbia, each with separate police forces and emergency plans—but all using the same roads and bridges—into a well-coordinated governmental operating complex . . .

In no other area of the country must vital decisionmaking and coordination occur between an independent city, two States, seventeen distinct local and regional authorities, including more than a dozen local police and Federal protective forces, and numerous Federal agencies.

In hearings before the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on the District of Columbia, Senator MARY LANDRIEU, the Distinguished Chair of the Subcommittee, and virtually every witness highlighted the region's high risk for terrorism and the critical need for coordinated and timely communication between the Federal Government and the surrounding State and local jurisdictions. I want to commend Senator LANDRIEU for her leadership on this very important issue and for working to address the emergency preparedness funding needs of the District of Columbia and the Washington Metro system.

Over the past year significant progress has been made on the State and local levels in emergency response protocols. The Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments, COG, the association representing the 17 major cities and counties in the region, should be commended for the strong partnerships and initiatives they have nurtured over the past twelve months, including the creation of the COG Ad Hoc Task Force on Homeland Security and the development of a Regional Emergency Response Plan.

Similarly, at a summit meeting convened last month, the mayor of the District of Columbia and the Governors of Maryland and Virginia took a major step forward with the signing of an eight-point "Commitments to Action" to improve coordination. Unfortunately, the Office of Homeland Security, which helped convene the summit, is not a party to the agreement.

What is still lacking, however, is the integration of the Federal Government's many and diverse protocols in the region with those of State and local authorities. This past August, a plan known as the Federal Emergency Decision and Notification Protocol was announced by the Administration, giving the directors of the Office of Personnel Management, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and the General Services Administration the authority to release Federal employees in the area and around the country. However, as an August 17, 2002 article in the Washington Post notes, "[left unclear by the plan is how Federal agencies execute the evacuation. Congress and the courts are independent of the President. Even Cabinet secretaries and senior agency directors have autonomy over their employees and buildings . . . ."]

I commend to my colleagues the September 10, 2002 edition of the Washington Post which featured a story detailing the status of emergency planning in the area, noting the work yet to be done by the Federal Government.

The unique and dominant Federal presence in this region obligates the Federal Government to become a fully cooperative partner in the region's efforts at emergency planning and preparedness.

One of the key goals of a new Department of Homeland Security is to consolidate the components of the Federal Government playing an integral role in the protection of the homeland, both existing and yet-to-be-created, into one single entity whose purpose is to coordinate these components and facilitate their individual missions.

In the National Capital Region, the many branches and agencies of the Federal Government similarly necessitate a single voice to aid and encourage the significant efforts already being undertaken by State, local, and regional authorities. It is with this goal in mind that my amendment proposes the creation of an office within a Department of Homeland Security that would provide such a voice.

The Office of National Capital Region Coordination would establish a single Federal point of contact within a new Department of Homeland Security. This office would not only coordinate the activities of the Department affecting the Nation's Capital, but also act as a one-stop shop through which State, local, and regional authorities can look for meaningful access to the plans and preparedness activities of the numerous other Federal agencies and entities in the region. Likewise, this new office would become the vehicle used by the multitude of Federal entities in the area to receive vital information and input from the state, local, and regional level in the development of the Federal Government's planning efforts.

In short, the Office of National Capital Region Coordination would ensure that the Federal Government takes a place at the table as this region makes unprecedented attempts to coordinate the work of its many State, local, and regional authorities.

The need for such an office has been expressed and supported by many of the most important participants and stakeholders in the area's terrorism preparedness activities, including COG, WMATA, the Greater Washington Board of Trade, and the Potomac Electric Power Company, PEPCO. I ask that letters of support from these groups be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

Mr. SARBANES. A year has passed since the horrific attacks of September 11th, and as we debate the shape and form of a new Department of Homeland Security, the time has come for the Federal Government to fulfill its obligations to the National Capital Region and those dedicated to preserving its safety. I would urge my colleagues to support this important amendment.

PEPCO HOLDINGS, INC.,
Washington, DC, September 10, 2002.

Hon. JOSEPH LIEBERMAN,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Government Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN LIEBERMAN: As Chief Executive Officer of Pepco Holdings Inc., I am writing to express my strong and unequivocal support for Senator Paul Sarbanes' amendment to the National Homeland Security and Combating Terrorism Act of 2002.

The proposed amendment would create within the Department of Homeland Security a National Capital Region Coordination Office. This office would have the responsibility of coordinating the response activities of the Federal, State, and local governments with that of the general public and the private sector.

The District of Columbia is truly in a unique situation when it comes to Homeland Security. As our Nation's Capital, the District is home to more than 370,000 Federal workers and draws over 18 million visitors annually. At the same time, given the multi-jurisdictional nature of the Greater Washington Metropolitan area and the enormous Federal presence, there are distinct challenges facing this region's efforts to have a comprehensive and coordinated response to terrorism.

For example, there are over a dozen separate local police departments in the greater Washington area. Overlaying this, there are another dozen Federal law enforcement agencies, each with their own jurisdiction and mandate. These departments have their own procedures and are developing their own contingency plans. Coordinating these efforts will not be an easy task and will require a dedicated office within the Department of Homeland Security.

Unfortunately on September 11 we saw what can happen if the region fails to coordinate its response. On the afternoon of the attack the Federal government sent home its entire workforce early without notifying anyone on the local level. At the same time the Federal government was releasing hundreds of thousands of Federal employees and contractors to already grid-locked roads and packed Metro stations. Federal agencies were erecting security zones and blocking off streets around their facilities making the evacuation of the District even more difficult.

Thankfully, there was no secondary attack after the Pentagon. But had there been one, this lack of coordination could have had disastrous results and I believe illustrated the need for a dedicated office within the Department.

As the major provider of electricity to the District of Columbia as well as Prince George's and Montgomery counties in Maryland, Pepco has spent a significant amount of time and effort on security issues since September 11. The more I look at the unique challenges we face in this new environment, both as Chief Executive and a Washingtonian, the more I believe in the need for Senator Sarbanes' proposal.

Thank you for your leadership on homeland security issues, and I trust that you will give the National Capital Region Coordination Office provision every consideration.

Sincerely,

JOHN M. DERRICK,
Chairman, Chief Executive Officer.

WASHINGTON AREA TRANSIT AUTHORITY,
Washington, DC, September 5, 2002.

Hon. JOSEPH LIEBERMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Governmental Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN LIEBERMAN: On behalf of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, I would like to express our great appreciation and strong support for your efforts to enhance security in the national capital region. We urge you to offer an amendment to S. 2452, the "National Homeland Security and Combating Terrorism Act of 2002" in order to address the specific needs of the National Capital Region, perhaps the area of greatest potential risk in the country.

Importantly, there is not central point of coordination for the many Federal entities in the region, including various executive branch agencies, the Office of Homeland Security, the Military District of Washington, the U.S. Congress, and the judicial branch. Effective coordination within the Federal government is absolutely critical in the National Capital Region in light of the fact that the Federal government is the region's largest employer. The recent Regional Summit on Security, convened by Governor Ridge, also pointed out the continuing need for effective coordination among all levels of government in the National Capital Region.

The other matter of concern is the enormous challenge this region faces in working constructively with the Administration as it formulates security budget proposals. While the Congress, through the appropriations process, has generally been quite receptive to funding requirements for security measures, it has been extremely difficult and cumbersome to present our case to the Administration for the resources needed to carry out the national strategy for combating terrorism and other homeland security activities, due to the highly decentralized nature of the Executive Branch budget development process. The proposed amendment provides a mechanism for a review of the funding resources required for the region to implement the national strategy for combating terrorism.

We greatly appreciate your attention and diligence in assisting the region in addressing these important issues. We are all facing challenges that previously seemed unthinkable. We owe you a great debt of gratitude for your leadership in assisting the National Capital Region in preparing to meet these challenges.

Sincerely,

CHRISTOPHER ZIMMERMAN,
Chairman, Board of Directors.

GREATER WASHINGTON BOARD OF TRADE,
Washington, DC, August 23, 2002.

Hon. JOSEPH LIEBERMAN,

DEAR CHAIRMAN LIEBERMAN: Thank you for your leadership on building a strong and thoughtful Department of Homeland Security. As you prepare your final mark on S. 2452 we urge you to include an amendment that calls for a separate office for the National Capital Region within the Department. The proposal is supported by many of your colleagues including Senators Warner, Allen, Sarbanes and Mikulski, as well as Senator Landrieu, ranking member of the District of Columbia Appropriations Subcommittee and Mayor Anthony Williams.

The National Capital Region is perhaps the area of greatest potential risk in the country to future terrorist attack. It is the seat of government, the location of many symbolic and historic structures, the venue for many high profile public events attended by large numbers of people, a key tourism destination that draws 18 million visitors annually and home to 370,000 federal workers and hundreds of lawmakers.

The area is unique in that it has dozens of federal agencies that have been mandated to have their own emergency preparedness plans. Most of these agencies have not coordinated their plans with local governments or private sector concerns that own and operate critical infrastructure like power, telecommunications and transportation, which the agencies are dependent. The region also has more than a dozen separate and distinct police forces representing seventeen jurisdictions and more than a dozen federal protective forces that need better coordination.

S. 2452 does not currently require the federal government to coordinate with the region or intradepartmentally, leaving the region and the nation's capital vulnerable. While coordination efforts are improving, there clearly needs to be an institutional structure in place to bring coordination to the level necessary in this complex environment.

We urge you to support the amendment to S. 2452 that will create a single point of contact within the Department of Homeland Security for coordination in the National Capital Region. The purpose is not to supercede any planning or action currently being undertaken, but only to serve as a coordinator of information, a point of contact for planning with the regional public and private sectors.

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. PECK,
President.

METROPOLITAN WASHINGTON
COUNCIL OF GOVERNMENTS,
Washington, DC, August 22, 2002.

Hon. JOSEPH LIEBERMAN,

DEAR CHAIRMAN LIEBERMAN: The Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments (COG) is appreciative of your efforts in strengthening the provisions of S. 2452, the National Homeland Security and Combating Terrorism Act of 2002, as it impacts the National Capital Region. In particular we endorse your efforts in insuring that federal terrorism preparedness and emergency response activities in the Washington, DC area are coordinated in consultation with those of the Region's sub-federal governments, private and non-profit entities, and the public generally.

As you are aware, COG is completing a year-long effort involving hundreds of public officials and public and private experts in the development of coordination and communications protocols for use by state and local governments, private and non-profit agencies, and other "stakeholders" concerned about preparation for and management of terrorist and other emergencies in the National Capital Region. Having a single contact point for coordinating these efforts with existing and proposed Federal response capacities is necessary for the effective and timely protection of life and property in the region.

The proposed amendment creates a function within the Department of Homeland Security which will be such a contact point, allowing full communication among the Federal and sub-federal entities dedicated to protection of this region and its citizens and coordination of their potentially supportive but disparate functions without impeding the planning or actions of either group.

Additionally, the creation of such a function recognizes the unique status of this region, with its strong presence of the Federal government as employer, policy-initiator, and potential target, as worthy of specific future Federal support.

The COG Ad Hoc Task Force on Homeland Security has considered the concepts and purposes contained in this proposed amendment and supports its enactment.

On behalf of my colleagues on the Task Force, I am pleased to endorse this proposed amendment and urge you to support its passage.

Sincerely,

CAROL SCHWARTZ,

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now continue with the consideration of H.R. 5093, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5093) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 2002, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the time until 5:15 will be equally divided between the chairman and the ranking member of the subcommittee or their designees prior to a vote on the cloture motion on the Byrd amendment No. 4480.

The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Madam President, Senator BYRD and Senator BURNS are not here. The Chair has already decreed that we will divide the time. But there have been a number of people waiting: Senator CRAPO, Senator DOMENICI, Senator CRAIG. Just for expedition purposes, if they would like to speak now, that is fine. We would wait until they finish. I do not know in what order they wish to go, so why don't we announce that so people aren't waiting around.

Mr. DOMENICI. How much time are we going to have?

Mr. REID. Half of 40 minutes, 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. If you want to let Senator CRAPO go first?

Mr. CRAIG. That will be fine.

Mr. REID. May we have an order?

You are going to use your time probably, now, and then a little over here or what do you want to do?

Mr. CRAIG. Madam President, Senator REID, I assume we would retain the last 5 minutes for closing purposes.

Mr. REID. Because it is your amendment.

Mr. CRAIG. Yes, because it is our amendment. We would want that.

Mr. REID. That is really no problem. It is our cloture motion, but if you want the last 5 minutes, that is fine. So we ask that consent. In the meantime, you use whatever time you need. So you have 15 minutes now.

Mr. CRAIG. I yield the Senator from Idaho 5 minutes.

Mr. CRAPO. Madam President, I rise in support of the efforts to address the serious and devastating impacts of fires that are currently raging throughout the West and to impress upon my colleagues the need for immediate action to reduce this threat in the future.

I thank my colleague from Idaho, Senator CRAIG, for his tireless efforts to try to find a path forward on a collaborative basis and to build the consensus necessary to address this difficult issue. The Senator from New Mexico as well has been very closely involved in developing these proposals. I commend him for his efforts.

As I begin, I offer my gratitude to the brave men and women who are fighting these fires. Wildland firefighting is a dangerous and exhausting job, and I can't thank them enough for their efforts. Already this year, 6.3 million acres have been burned, and this level of destruction puts us on pace to meet the catastrophic fire season of 2000, when 8.4 million acres burned, with more than a million of those acres in Idaho.

Idaho has been relatively lucky this year. However, with outbreaks of Douglas fir beetles and mountain pine beetles throughout Idaho, it is clear we are poised for another dangerous fire season.

Not all fire is bad. In fact, fire can be beneficial. However, many of the fires we face today are fueled by unnatural fuels and burn with an intensity and size that makes them undesirable in our natural ecology. Additionally, insect and disease outbreaks are often naturally occurring agents of change, yet some outbreaks are enhanced by our past actions and inactions and occur in scopes that are damaging and unnatural.

As a result of the previous fire seasons, Congress acted with an immediate and bipartisan response.

We came forward with funding and direction for a national fire plan. Yet, to date, this plan has not been implemented effectively enough to address the risks facing our communities.

I do not think we should be pointing fingers or making excuses about why or how these fires occurred. We need to look forward and address the problem. We need to do so quickly. I do not want to see another million acres burning in Idaho next year.

In his Healthy Forests Initiative, the President outlined actions that will effectively address the risk of catastrophic wildfires. In the Fiscal Year 2002 supplemental appropriations bill, our majority leader identified a way to effectively reduce the risks in the Black Hills National Forest. Clearly, we all want to protect our forests.

Our forests are an important part of our heritage and have great impacts on local economies and recreational opportunities for local residents and visitors alike. They provide our drinking water and wildlife habitat. In short, healthy forests are vital to all Americans.

The Forest Service has identified 70 million acres of Condition Class III lands. These lands are at catastrophic risk of wildfire and subject to insect and disease infestations, windthrow, and other health risks. It is important to address risks on these lands, but it must be noted that today we are not debating action in all of these areas.

As I said, many of these threats are natural and we may choose to let them occur naturally. However, we must act—and act quickly—to protect our high value forest areas. We must act to protect homes, property, and livelihood, maintain the quality of our watersheds, and take steps to ensure that burned areas are quickly rehabilitated rather than face the dangerous risks of reburn.

Again, the amendments we are discussing do not include the entire 196 million acre National Forest System or 74.5 million acres of condition class III areas, but instead address areas where we cannot allow endless delays. We do so without eliminating public recourse. There has also been speculation the language will do what Senator DASCHLE did and limit all appeals and judicial review. This is not true.

Critics also contend the amendment suspends environmental laws. That is also false. The amendment requires that projects be consistent with the applicable forest plans or resource management plans. I can tell you from experience that these site-specific plans take years of work with widespread public involvement and compliance with all of our environmental laws.

Protecting our environment and the opportunity for public involvement is a vital part of any actions on our public lands. Reducing the risk of fire is no exception. However, the imminent threat demands we act quickly and move past stalling tactics and countless delays.

Damage to our environment from these fires is acute. The harm to local economies is felt in many ways. It is clear our forests have deteriorated to the point where active management is a necessity. I hope my colleagues recognize that and will support the efforts of member's whose goal is to protect their communities and environment.

I encourage all of the Senators to vote against the cloture motion.

Mr. CRAIG. Madam President, I thank my colleague from Idaho for his very thoughtful presentation and his true expression of the real conditions on our forest lands.

I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Madam President, I thank my colleague, Senator CRAIG, who has spoken to the broader issue of the problem we face, and the firefighters. And Senator CRAPO elaborated on that some.

Let me speak for a moment about why I support the Craig-Domenici amendment from a local standpoint. It certainly provides a critical tool in doing the job that we know needs to be done. We know there are counter-proposals floating around. From my perspective, that does not accomplish what we need to have done.

Let me speak a couple of minutes about what happened near the town of Durango, CO. I live about 18 miles from there. In fact, during the Missionary Ridge fire, we watched it with great anticipation from our porch at our ranch.

Durango is a very scenic town in Colorado, home of one of only 13 gold medal trout streams in the whole country, and has some of the finest mountain biking areas in the West.

Two months ago, there was a fire called the Missionary Ridge fire, declared under control on July 28, but only after we had lost over 70,000 acres of forest, 56 homes, 27 adjoining buildings, and the collective cost of $40.6 million to fight that fire. More importantly, large areas around the Lemon and Vallecito Reservoirs burned so intensely that the soil had become hydrophobic and unable to keep water back. Downstream, the La Plata, Aimas, Los Pinos, and Florida Rivers were now all at risk.

When I was home this past weekend, I was reading in the local newspaper about several homes that were washed off their foundations by the mud slides as a result of that loose soil caused by the fire and the burning of all of the underbrush and trees.

That $40.6 million lost, to put it in context, is more than double the amount of funding allocated for recreation for all of the 11 forests in Region II, which is Colorado, Wyoming, South Dakota, and Nebraska. It is four times the amount of funding for wildlife for all 11 forests in Region II for fiscal year 2002. It is nearly double the amount of money allocated to the region for hazardous fuels reduction work for fiscal year 2002. So in a little over 1½ months, we spent more allowing that area to be destroyed by fire than we would have spent on wildlife habitat management on all 11 forests over 4 years.

Speaking of wildlife, when the Missionary Ridge fire was at its highest level of intensity, I happened to have a chance to talk to one of the firefighters who had been on the front line. He told me he estimated the fire to be moving at about 50 miles an hour—literally out of control—and actually saw birds being burned out of the sky because they were unable to outfly that fire, and that a number of small animals literally burned alive because they could not outrun that fire. There are just terrible stories about what happened.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some excerpts of stories in the local newspapers in Durango of September 8, 10, 13, and 14.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 8, 2002

The Valley Fire began on June 25th and quickly consumed 10 homes and 378 acres, about 160 acres were burned on private land.

Fall Creek Ranch residents hired a logging company to help remove logs and place other logs around areas where waters tend to flow heavily. The residents have poured $26,000 into mitigation so far.

Just under an inch of rain in less than an hour created mud and water flows that cover Florida Road, County Road 501, and County Road 245. About 700 customers at the Bar D Chuckwagon restaurant were trapped until about 10 p.m.

SEPTEMBER 10, 2002

The City of Durango's turbidity went from 2 NTU's (a measure of the number of small particles that are suspended in a water sample) or practically colorless, on Friday, to 440 NTU's, a chocolate brown by Monday.

A waive of ash, mud and debris cascaded down from Missionary Ridge burn area late Wednesday, flooding fields and roads and temporarily stranded some residents north and east of Durango.

SEPTEMBER 13, 2002

Only about a quarter-inch of rain fell, but it was enough to close roads, flood houses and clog culverts.

LaPine County has spent about $100,000 keeping roads and drainage structures clear of mudslides.

"There are homes out there that never expected to be influenced by flooding that are getting a hell of a surprise," said Doyle Viller La Plata County director of road maintenance.

Dead fish are littering the banks of the Animas River after recent mudslides in the Animas Valley, and there could be hundreds more beneath the murky water.

The mud is so thick that they (the fish) can't breathe in the water said Mike Japhet, State of Colorado Division of Wildlife.

He received one report that the fish were "gasping for air and trying to swim out of the water onto the bank" near 32nd Street in Durango on Sunday.

All the fish around the 32nd Street Bridge, appear to be dead, Japhet said, and the death zone could extend north for several miles to where the mud entered the water.

SEPTEMBER 14, 2002

The county estimates that more than $100,000 has been spent on clearing roads and ditches near Lemon and Vallecito Reservoirs, and there has been more than $1 million in personal property damage from flash flooding.

OCTOBER 2002 BICYCLING MAGAZINE ARTICLE—RUSSELL ZIMMERMAN, DURANGO BICYCLE SHOP OWNER

"The last time I rode here, the forest was so dense you could see no more than 100 feet ahead. There is nothing left today, no living thing within a mile to interrupt the barren landscape. No fallen trees, no bushes, no grass.

"The bottom of my wheels disappear into the three-inch-deep layer of ash. The route is the same, but the trail is different. Roots are gone, burned away. Some of the rocks have even been vaporized."

"My tires kick up a fine dust that covers the bike, and me. No one could follow me; they'd choke." Before the fire, I'd spot a porcupine every ride. Or a deer, or elk or bear. Not this time."

Mr. CAMPBELL. Madam President, the result now, of course, is that on the Animas River, which goes through the town of Durango, dead fish are littering the banks because so much mud has come into the water.

Mike Japhet of the Colorado Division of Wildlife said that in some places fish are actually trying to get out of the water because they cannot breath. He received one report that fish were actually "gasping for air" as they tried to stay alive.

The local county has spent over $100,000 just clearing mud from roads and ditches near the Lemon and Vallecito Reservoirs that were affected by this fire.

I want to add my voice to the Craig-Domenici amendment. I just want to point out from a local point of view the catastrophic results.

Our little town of Durango in fact relies heavily on tourism. An old train takes tourists through the mountains. They had 28,000 cancellations in just 2 weeks because of that fire. Those cancellations, of course, result in money lost to the local community. The estimated loss of revenue during the month after that fire in the town of Durango was estimated to be about 40 percent from the normal resources they would have been able to rely on from tourists who stay in motels and who eat in the restaurants.

The facts are clear: unnaturally dense forests result in unnaturally hot burning and fast moving fires, like we experienced in Colorado.

Our proposal would address the problem in a balanced way—even providing greater review of projects than the majority leader's plan that takes care of his own state that he managed to attach to the emergency supplemental bill.

We know what needs to be done, but now opponents are opposing our bill and offering counterproposals that will do absolutely nothing to help forest managers thin these forests to reduce the risk of these catastrophic fires, nor allow for any salvage operations to help pay for the rehabilitation of these areas.

What does the counterproposal do? Their proposal does nothing more than sell the public a false bag of goods—it does nothing but create false expectations in the public.

My state of Colorado has experienced enough from prior bad policies. I am offended that some would now suggest new ones.

Since my friends on the other side know what needs to be done, why are they proposing such ineffective policy?

Because we are in an election year and some politically-active environmental groups are drafting the policy. It is not a secret. They say there is a lot of campaign money at stake—television and radio ads that could be poured into your State if you oppose doing the right thing.

It is time to do the right thing. It is time for these environmental groups to start looking at policies that benefit the environment rather than maintaining the political hammerlock they have on the Forest Service and BLM.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

If no one yields time, time will be charged equally to both sides.

The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, how much time do we have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seven minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator on our side, and then I will be glad to offer the remainder to Senator BYRD.

Mr. REID. Madam President, that wouldn't give the Senator the last 5 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, fellow Senators, I come today to the floor because there is a very important amendment that is attached to the Interior appropriations bill, and it is a second-degree amendment attached to the Byrd amendment.

The only thing I would like to say today, since cloture has been called for on the Byrd amendment, is that if in fact cloture is invoked, our amendment will disappear. We believe our amendment is a good amendment and it deserves an up-or-down vote.

We have not been delaying things. We have been waiting for an opportunity to have a vote. We would like an up-or-down vote on our amendment, which is an effort by a number of Senators on both sides of the aisle to permit the Forest Service and the BLM of the United States to go into our forest lands that desperately need cleanup and to look at just four types of properties that belong to our Federal Government: those that have blown over and are there, and where they are unable to do anything—the trees are, in fact, dormant—forests that have been bitten and eaten so that the bugs have infested them, so they are useless, but we leave them there instead of removing them, and removing all of the substance that is there with them. And there are two other kinds similar to that, and we address them.

All we try to do is say: Can't we expedite the removal of that substance I have just described which causes fires? Because once any of that starts, you cannot stop it, and it goes like wildfire. And since our forests are not maintained properly, it burns thousands and, in some instances—like this year—millions of acres.

As I see it, it is time we do something practical. Our amendment is commonsense cleanup for the forests that are being destroyed. I do not believe the amendment—that will be offered later on, if we lose—does that in a proper manner. I believe it makes it just as difficult, if not more difficult, to remove this kindling, this buildup that is permitting our forests to burn.

We are not delaying any bill. We are asking for a chance to vote. Whenever it is possible in the Senate, we want a vote. That is all we ask. We will have more time then to explain it in detail.

It is common sense. It is not anti-environment. It is a rational, reasonable way to clean four kinds of forests that none of us would like to leave in their current situation so that they will become the essence of the next firestorms of the West.

If I have not used all my time, I yield the remainder of it to Senator CRAIG for his allocation or use. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nineteen minutes.

Mr. BYRD. How much of that time—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I am sorry, 19 minutes remain for the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Madam President, the underlying first-degree amendment, which is the subject of the cloture vote this afternoon, provides $825 million in emergency funds to the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management. That money will be used to repay the extraordinary fire suppression costs incurred by those agencies over the past several months.

As many of our colleagues know, particularly those who represent Western States, 2002 is turning out to be one of the most devastating fire seasons on record. Over the past 10 years, the average number of acres burned by fire between January 1 and September 16 has been 3.4 million acres. This year, however, the comparable number of acres burned is 6.4 million; almost twice the 10-year average.

But this problem is much more than just the numbers of acres burned. The devastation and destruction resulting from these fires is almost too much to comprehend. Fire suppression costs will exceed $1.5 billion. Nearly 3,000 structures have been destroyed, including 1,313 homes. And, most tragic of all, 21 citizens have lost their lives fighting these treacherous fires.

Clearly, Madam President, this situation amounts to a domestic emergency of historic proportions.

That is why Senator BURNS and I proposed this amendment and why so many of our colleagues have joined us in this endeavor. Indeed, even the President has come to appreciate the need for this assistance, as evidenced by his August 28 funding request to Congress.

Madam President, it is of the utmost importance that we move forward on this matter, and that we do so in a timely manner. In fact, I would remind my colleagues that the authority to designate such funds as an emergency expires on September 30. Consequently, if this bill is not signed into law by the end of the month, there is a very real possibility that these funds will not be made available. I urge my colleagues to support the cloture motion, and help us in our effort to help our firefighters.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

How much time does the distinguished Senator from North Dakota wish?

Mr. CONRAD. Five minutes.

Mr. BYRD. I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, Mr. CONRAD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER). The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I understand certain comments were made about the slowness of the appropriations process and the assertion that not having a budget resolution pass the floor is the reason for that.

I do not think that is supported by the facts. The appropriations process is moving slowly for reasons that have no relationship to a budget resolution or having one or not having one.

The fact is, the appropriators agreed to an amount for a budget that was what was recommended in the resolution that went through the Budget Committee. The appropriators agreed unanimously—Democrats and Republicans—to adopt the budget amount for this year that the committee recommended.

So there is nothing to prevent appropriations bills from coming to the floor in an orderly process. The appropriators gave to each of the committees an allocation that added up to the amount of money that was provided for in the recommendation by the Budget Committee. So that is not the problem here.

No. 2, I think it should be pointed out that we had an opportunity on the floor to pass a budget for this year and got 59 votes. We got 59 votes. Now, it required 60 votes. But we had a bipartisan supermajority in the Senate for a budget amount for this year—not a budget resolution but a budget amount for this year. We fell one vote short of getting that amount approved.

Frankly, all of this misses the larger point. The reason we are in deep financial trouble now has nothing to do with the budget resolution for this year at all. The real problem is the budget resolution that passed last year. The budget resolution that passed last year put us on the course of a 10-year plan that has contributed to the most dramatic reversal in our fiscal fortunes in our Nation's history.

It was the budget resolution that passed last year that contained a massive and unaffordable tax cut that has undermined the fiscal strength of this country for years to come.

Last year, we were told we would have $5.6 trillion of budget surplus over the next decade—$5.6 trillion. Now, if we look at the Congressional Budget Office's new report, what we see is no surpluses; the money is all gone.

If we just adopt the President's recommendation on spending and taxes for the next 10 years—no additional spending by Congress, not a dime—if we just adopt his proposals, we will be $400 billion in the red. That is after being told last year we had $5.6 trillion of surpluses over the next decade. Now we are $400 billion in the hole. That is a $6 trillion turn.

And what are the reasons for it? The No. 1 reason is the tax cuts that were in last year's budget, pushed by the President, passed by the Congress. That accounts for over a third of the disappearance of the surplus.

The next biggest reason: technical considerations that apply to revenue not meeting the estimates. That is the second biggest reason—not related to the tax cut, but it is the second biggest reason.

The third biggest reason is the increased costs because of the attack on the United States.

I am talking now about, over the 10 years of the President's budget plan, what are the contributing factors to the disappearance of the surplus. The biggest reason—over a third—is the tax cut, 34 percent. The second biggest reason: revenue not meeting expectations, apart from the tax cut; that is 29 percent. Twenty-two percent is increased costs associated with the attack on the country. And the last, and smallest, part of the problem is the economic slowdown, representing 14 or 15 percent of the disappearance of the surplus.

That is the reality. The appropriations process not moving forward has nothing to do with the budget resolution being passed or not passed. The simple fact is, the appropriators agreed to the amount that was in the budget proposal that passed the Budget Committee. They did so on a unanimous basis, and they proceeded to stay within that amount. That is the reality.

The bigger truth, the larger reality is that we have fiscal problems because of the budget that passed last year. That put us on a course that does not add up, never has added up, and will require serious work in the future, if we are going to get back on track.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I have the 5 remaining minutes prior to the vote reserved. We have no more time to allocate on our side. The assistant leader said we could use time if there were no speakers from the other side. Senator BYRD is here.

Mr. BYRD. How much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ten minutes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, does the Senator want more than 5 minutes? Do you need more?

Mr. CRAIG. I think our colleague from Oklahoma would like to speak for 5, and then if I could use 5 to close it out, then we could advance the vote.

Mr. BYRD. It is fine with me if the Senator closes. The Senator wants 5 minutes over there. How much time does the Senator need?

Mr. BURNS. Two. That is all I need.

Mr. BYRD. I yield 2 minutes to the ranking member and I will yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator. I am always very accommodating, most always, to Senators from the other side of the aisle. Then will I have any more time left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator yields 10 minutes, that would exhaust his time.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair. I won't need it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I thank my colleague and friend from West Virginia for his yielding a couple minutes. I will be brief.

I urge my colleagues to vote no on cloture. I say that knowing my friend and colleague from West Virginia, I guess, is going to support it. But he is chairman of the Appropriations Committee. I have been on the committee. I have been in the Senate for a long time. It is a very bad idea to start filing cloture on any amendment that you don't like on appropriations bills. It is a bad idea for a couple reasons. One, it won't work. You are not going to be able to take a cloture vote and say, "We will have a fire amendment and it is going to spend several hundred million dollars on fire, but we will not have any other amendment dealing with this issue," because it won't work.

The Senator from Idaho is entitled to his amendment. Even if cloture is invoked, we can still get a vote on the Senator's amendment, or some other Senator can offer a similar amendment.

I will, first, tell my colleague from West Virginia, I don't like cloture. To me, it should be used very sparingly. It is becoming far too prevalent in the Senate where somebody says: We will just file cloture.

Someone told me: We will file cloture on homeland security. We will wrap that up.

Of course, that would deny us the opportunity to offer the President's bill on homeland security. They may file it, but they will not get cloture. The President is entitled to have a vote on his homeland security proposal, and we are going to get it, just as the Senator from Idaho is entitled to have his vote on fire control. Other Senators have ideas.

My point is, you can waste days on cloture. We wasted 3 days. No one on this side of the aisle was filibustering the Interior bill or filibustering homeland security, nor should they, in my opinion. I hope we don't have filibusters ever, frankly, on appropriations bills. We need to decide how much we are going to spend and how we will do it.

Maybe if somebody came up with an amendment that is so offensive, so intrusive, so anti an individual State that they would filibuster, that might be unique, but I haven't found that yet in my Senate career on an appropriations bill. I can't remember filibusters on appropriations bills. I have only been here 22 years—not nearly as long as my friend from West Virginia. It is a terrible idea if somebody says: I don't like that amendment so we will file cloture on it and hope it goes away. If cloture is adopted, the Craig-Domenici amendment will disappear.

I am telling my colleagues, it will not disappear, even if cloture is invoked. And if it is, I might tell my friends, we could spread out, we could waste another couple days. I don't think anybody wants to do that because we have no interest in filibustering anything.

My colleague from New Mexico is a very good legislator, and he has a couple ideas on fire management, and so does my colleague from Idaho. I know the other Senator from Idaho and other Senators have ideas, and they are entitled to have their amendments considered. And they will be considered at some point.

I urge my colleagues, let's not get in the habit of going the route of cloture if an amendment appears and we say we don't really like it. That process will not work. We only have a week from Monday to complete action on the appropriations bills, if we are going to have them done by the end of the fiscal year. That is only 13 days. We have already spent a week and a half on the Interior bill and we are not even getting close.

We have basically had an amendment on drought, and we were precluded from offering another drought amendment. And now we have a fire amendment, appropriating money for fire, and my colleague is trying to be denied a vote.

This side is going to find a way to get some votes on this bill. We can spend weeks doing it or we can spend days. We can spend an hour. I heard my colleague from Idaho said he is willing to have a time limit. He is willing to have a side by side. I know the Senator from New Mexico has a fire amendment. Great. Senator BINGAMAN, I think, that is a different fire amendment, and I think that is fine. Let's vote on those amendments.

I appreciate my colleague from West Virginia yielding. I urge my colleagues to vote no on cloture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. BURNS. I thank the Chair. I thank my chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, how much time does he have? How much time is left on the other side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has 4 minutes 20 seconds; the Senator from Idaho, 4 minutes 10 seconds.

Mr. BURNS. I will take the first 4 minutes. I thank my good friend from West Virginia also for allocating the time.

As he believes very much in the Constitution of the United States, I also believe in some of the rulings of the Senate. And I think I would be remiss as ranking member on this committee and a comanager on this bill if I did not fight for the rights of the rest of the Members in this body to have a vote. I think it is what it is all about. That is for debate.

I haven't heard anybody come down here and talk against the merits of this second-degree amendment. It will not go away. And silence tells me that maybe the case has already been made and hard to defend of what we are trying to do as far as forest health is concerned. Twenty years, 25 years is a track record, a known track record. And now we see the culmination of those management practices over that many years in the growth of the forest and what it can lead to if we allow folks who probably don't have all the experience in the world, on the ground management of a renewable resource, what that brings us to.

So I would hope that we would support cloture or deny cloture so this issue can be talked out because it will not go away. I am not real sure it is not the shortest way to arrive at a vote and settlement of the issue.

I thank my good friend from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, why do we want to vote down cloture? There are other appropriations bills coming to the floor. I am supporting the Senator's amendment. I never said a word against his amendment. I would be very supportive of it. I am not filibustering it, and I haven't filibustered anything else. I haven't filibustered the homeland security bill, either. I have heard some intimations this afternoon that I have filibustered. My Lord, some people around here wouldn't recognize a filibuster if they met it on the way home. I know what a filibuster is. But I am not against this amendment. Why would we want to vote against this cloture?

Mr. NICKLES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. NICKLES. Correct me if I am wrong. If cloture is invoked, the amendment of our friend from Idaho would no longer be germane and it would fall. We would like our colleague to have the right to offer his amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there are other appropriations bills coming. Why not vote for this bill and do some of the good things that are being done with this bill, and the Senator can come back another day with his amendment? I am not opposed to his amendment. Why do we want to penalize other parts of the country and other Senators for good things that are in the bill because some Senators don't want to vote for cloture on this?

This is an appropriations bill. Those advocating voting against cloture, in many instances, are Senators who are on the Appropriations Committee. Why? We need to get on with this. Let's vote cloture on this and the Senator will have another day, another opportunity on another appropriations bill.

I am for his amendment. I think he has made a good statement in support of it. I cannot understand why we want to cut off our nose to spite our face on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I will use my leader time to make a couple final remarks before I leave the floor for another event I need to attend.

The Senator from West Virginia just now said it so well. There is an ongoing filibuster on this amendment, but not on this side. It is not on this side. There is no question that, on controversial issues, this Senate must acquire 60 votes to pass an amendment. The Senator from Idaho has offered an amendment that does not have the requisite 60 votes. The Senator from New Mexico and others on our side have offered an alternative that we acknowledge does not have 60 votes. Over the course of the last several weeks, we have attempted to find common ground and, at least to date, have failed. In fact, I recall vividly last week on the floor the Senator from Idaho indicated they were going to make another effort yesterday to attempt to reach that common ground. That has not happened.

So it is fair to say that both sides have failed to reach the Senate requisite for controversial amendments, which is 60 votes. We had offered a procedural compromise since we could not find a substantive one. That compromise would be to have side-by-side votes, to indicate that there is support, but not the level of support required under Senate rules. That, too, failed.

So the bottom line is that we have an amendment pending that 1 week ago today generated 79 votes; 79 people went on record—Republican and Democrat—supporting drought assistance on an amendment that supports firefighting assistance. The President and others have said the firefighting money is urgent. I would like to reread the speeches made last week about the urgency of getting something done on drought assistance, about how important it is to get out there and provide this help now.

Well, in the next 5 minutes we will have a chance to provide this help now.

The Senator from Idaho is not precluded from reoffering this amendment to the Interior appropriations bill. He can do that. So to say it is now or never for them is just not correct. There is nothing to preclude them from going back and offering this amendment to the underlying bill—nothing. So if they vote against cloture, they are voting against firefighting assistance, against drought assistance, and there can be no other conclusion.

Don't tell me you have to do it on this amendment or you cannot do it at all. That is not right. So let's get real and be honest here. There is a game being played here that I think ought to be shown for what it is—a game that, for whatever reason, is denying this amendment passage today, even though the debate and consultation and the continued cooperative effort to see if common ground can be achieved. I just talked, moments ago, to Senator BINGAMAN. He said he has another meeting scheduled—I think it is this afternoon—with Senators on both sides of the aisle to see if they can reach common ground. If they can, it can be offered to the bill.

For the life of me, I don't understand why anybody can say, on one hand, how urgent it is to get firefighter assistance, drought assistance—by the way, I ask unanimous consent that the votes of those Senators who supported that amendment a week ago be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE ROLL CALL VOTES, 107TH CONGRESS—2ND SESSION (2002)

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, there can be no doubt. If we are serious about moving this legislation forward and providing this assistance, we take care of this amendment and move on to other issues. We have been on this bill now for 3 weeks. We will be on it for another couple weeks, the way it looks. There comes a time when we just have to move on and when we have to recognize that, under Senate rules, we either have to accommodate the rules, or reach some compromise, or drop the amendment. We have those three options.

We cannot accommodate the rules today because neither side has 60 votes. Let's recognize it for what it is. This is a delay. Until we get over this delay, we cannot provide the kind of assistance to firefighters and farmers and ranchers that is absolutely critical across the country. And the very speeches we made last week are just as real and important and urgent today.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, for the life of me, I must tell the majority leader, I cannot understand what you speak of. There has been no filibuster on this bill, and a second-degree amendment is not extraordinary nor does it require 60 votes. You know the rules as well as I do. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee just came to the floor and made the right speech, talking about the urgency of his amendment and firefighting money. I support it totally.

If we don't deal with his amendment and deal with my amendment in concept as a new public policy for this country, he as chairman, or another chairman, will be coming to the floor every year and asking for $1.5 billion to $2 billion of taxpayer money to fight the wildfires of the West, across the Alleghenies, and down to the Blue Ridge. That is the reality of a misguided public policy that has put our national treasures at risk, the U.S. forestlands.

This year, we burned over 6.5 million acres; the chairman spoke to that. We lost 2,100 homes; the chairman spoke to that. We lost 21 lives; the chairman spoke to that, too. This is a tactic to stall? Not at all. No, the majority leader, in my opinion, misspoke. There has been no filibuster. I have kept him and the assistant leader in full consultation as we have tried to resolve and bring, in a bipartisan way, a clear new adjustment in public policy. We cannot arrive at that. It is my amendment that is now up as a second degree, and appropriately so.

I ask for a vote on it, an up-or-down vote, as it is entitled to. I would accept a side-by-side debate with Senator BINGAMAN's alternative but not a 60-vote, no—51 or 50. Majority rules here, except under the rules that require a 60 vote. In this instance, it is not required.

I hope my colleagues will join with us this afternoon and say no to cloture, and maybe then we can move expeditiously because we have lost days when this could have been resolved very quickly.

I don't blame the Senator from West Virginia for being frustrated. He is chairman of the Interior Subcommittee. He brought a bill to the floor that most of us want. The majority leader knows I supported the aid to farmers and ranchers that have experienced catastrophic drought. It is not my intention, nor anyone else's, to hold up that money. But it is our intention, it is our purpose, and we will have a vote, to deal with national forest policy that will slightly adjust our ability to get active on the land, to remove the fuel, to improve the forest health, to save the watershed, to save the wildlife habitat, and, also, to save homes and people's lives and the beautiful landscapes of the public forests of these United States.

Shame on us for failing to address a policy that, this year, has allowed the burning of 6.5 million acres of public land, and the fires will continue year after year into the future until the public stands up and says: Congress, United States Senate, change your ways. Your policy isn't working. Your policy is not working, and our forests are burning and our forests are being lost because of public policy.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CRAIG. I will be happy to respond to a question.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I say to the Senator, did I hear the majority leader say that if we lose and we are knocked down by cloture, we can offer this legislation later?

Mr. CRAIG. The Senator did hear that.

Mr. DOMENICI. I wonder how we could be delaying the bill then.

Mr. CRAIG. We are not.

Mr. DOMENICI. How could we be delaying it? If we have a chance to do it later, wouldn't we be delaying it then, too?

Mr. CRAIG. It is not our intention to delay. We have never intended to delay the bill.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CRAIG. I will be happy to yield if I have time remaining.

Mr. BYRD. Why won't Senators vote for cloture? There are many other needs being addressed by this bill. I have said I will support the Senator on another bill later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time required for the cloture vote—

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. I am trying to salvage a bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. Which bill is the Senator referring to, our amendment or the big bill?

Mr. BYRD. Why vote down cloture on this amendment? What is wrong with it?

Mr. DOMENICI. It is an amendment properly to the Interior bill. Why would we knock it down? It is germane. It is relevant. And put it where? Where would we put it? The Senator said put it on another bill. Where? It is a very important subject matter. It is just as important as the burning amendment.

Mr. BYRD. If they intend to bring it up later, why not vote for cloture here? Senators can always bring up something later.

Mr. DOMENICI. I say to the Senator from West Virginia, this is the most appropriate bill for it to be on.

Mr. BYRD. Of course it is, but if you cannot get it on one bill, you try on another.

Mr. DOMENICI. Why does the Senator want us to vote to take it off the bill? Those who have worked hard on this issue want it on the bill.

Mr. BYRD. I have not opposed that. I tried to be very understanding with the Senator. We cannot have everything the way we want it. I have lost a few amendments in my time that were of interest to my part of the country, too.

Mr. DOMENICI. The majority leader is even wrong in saying this amendment needs 60 votes. It does not need 60 votes, even with a budget resolution. It is just an authorization bill. It is implementing what you put in the bill, the $825 million. It is not subject to 60 votes, which means—why not have cloture; they both need 60 votes anyway. That is not so. Our bill does not need 60 votes, nor does Senator BINGAMAN's amendment need 60 votes. Pure and simple: 51 votes on a bill on which they belong. So why would we, who have struggled with it, vote to kill it? We want it alive. We want it to go to conference with the Senator when we all go to conference.

Mr. BYRD. Why don't Senators help me get this bill to conference? That is what I am asking. Why don't Senators help me get this bill to conference?

Mr. DOMENICI. We are going to help with the Interior bill—both bills.

Mr. BYRD. I hope so.

Mr. DOMENICI. This is the only measure in which we are interested. We have gotten together for hours in the offices of five different Senators because it is important. And then somebody comes along and says: Let's have a cloture vote and kill the bill.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, pursuant to rule XXII, the Chair lays before the Senate the pending cloture motion, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close the debate on Senator BYRD's amendment No. 4480.

Joseph Lieberman, Harry Reid, Jean Carnahan, Daniel K. Inouye, Christopher Dodd, Herb Kohl, Jack Reed, Richard J. Durbin, Kent Conrad, Paul Wellstone, Patrick Leahy, Jeff Bingaman, Barbara Boxer, Byron L. Dorgan, Mark Dayton, Debbie Stabenow, Jim Jeffords, Robert Torricelli.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the mandatory quorum call has been waived.

The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on the Byrd amendment No. 4480 to H.R. 5093, the Department of Interior and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, shall be brought to a close? The yeas and nays are required under the rule. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. REID. I announce that the Senator from New York (Mr. SCHUMER) is absent because of a death in the family.

NOT VOTING—1

Schumer

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 50, the nays are 49. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is rejected.

The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DASCHLE. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which cloture was not invoked on amendment No. 4480.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is entered.

Mr. DASCHLE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, shortly we will dispose of the Lieberman and Thompson amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. May we have order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DASCHLE. If I could just restate: We will dispose of the Lieberman and Thompson amendments. It is my understanding, once that has occurred, Senator BYRD will offer his amendment. It is my understanding that debate will take place tonight, and of course tomorrow.

With that understanding, there will be no more rollcall votes this evening. I yield the floor.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I seek recognition first to thank Senator BYRD, the Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee and its Interior Subcommittee and the Subcommittee Ranking Republican, Senator BURNS, for their efforts in drafting the fiscal year 2003 spending plan for the agencies under their jurisdiction. Also, I want to call attention in particular to two competitively awarded initiatives that, unfortunately, the annual Department of Energy, DOE, budget submission routinely underfunds and expects Congress to correct.

First, Air Products and Chemicals, Inc. and its partners, DOE, Ceramtec, ChevronTexaco, Eltron Research, McDermott Technology and Concepts NREC, are developing a unique, oxygen-producing technology based on high-temperature, ion transport membranes, ITM. The technology, ITM Oxygen, would be combined with an Integrated Gasification Combined Cycle, IGCC, system to produce oxygen and electric power for the iron/steel, non-ferrous metals, glass, pulp and paper, cogeneration, and chemicals and refining industries. The ITM Oxygen project is a cornerstone project in DOE's Vision 21 efforts and has the potential to significantly reduce the cost of tonnage oxygen plants for IGCC systems.

The DOE fiscal year 2003 cost-share requirement is $6.5 million from the Fossil Energy Research and Development, Coal and other Power Systems, President's Coal Research Initiative, Advanced Systems budget under IGCC, Vision 21. Unfortunately, DOE requested only $3.5 million for the ITM Oxygen project. Underfunding ITM Oxygen in fiscal year 2003 by $3 million would result in a delay of the program, by at least one year and I am advised it would add approximately $10 million to the program's costs.

Second, DOE's ITM Syngas program is developing a ceramic membrane reactor able to separate oxygen from air and partially oxidize methane to produce synthesis gas in a single step. Development of this technology will lead to numerous applications including clean transportation fuels, hydrogen for fuel cell applications, and chemical feedstocks. A critical application is gas-to-liquids, GTL, conversion where ITM Syngas technology will significantly improve the overall economics of GTL and permit the economical recovery of more than 37 trillion cubic feet of stranded Alaska North Slope gas.

Air Products and Chemicals, Inc. is leading a research team comprising Pacific Northwest National Laboratories, McDermott Technology, Ceramatec, ChevronTexaco, Eltron Research, Norsk Hydro, the University of Alaska-Fairbanks, the University of Pennsylvania, and Pennsylvania State University.

The DOE fiscal year 2003 cost share requirement is $5.5 million from the Fossil Energy Research and Development, Coal and Other Power Systems, President's Coal Research Initiative, Fuels, Transportation Fuels and Chemicals program. DOE's fiscal year 2003 budget request of $5.0 million for the Fossil Energy Research and Development, Coal and Other Power Systems, President's Coal Research Initiative, Fuels, Transportation Fuels and Chemicals program budget includes just $2.4 million to continue the ITM Syngas/Hydrogen project. Underfunding ITM Syngas in fiscal year 2003 would result in stretching out the program and increasing overall program costs.

I want to thank the Senators from West Virginia and Montana for having supported in the past both the ITM Oxygen and Syngas programs. Because of their attention, both development efforts have remained on cost, on schedule and promise to be true success stories. Now I want to thank them again, for adding $6 million to the DOE's request for IGCC programs and $15 million for transportation fuels and chemicals programs. This additional funding will ensure that ongoing programs like the ITM Oxygen and ITM Syngas are fully funded in fiscal year 2003. I look forward to working with both the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Montana as they conference with our colleagues in the House of Representatives to ensure that $6.5 million is provided for ITM Oxygen and ITM Syngas is funded at $5.5 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the bill by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5005) to establish the Department of Homeland Security, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT NO. 4534 WITHDRAWN

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Florida and myself, I withdraw the pending amendment to the Thompson amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right. The amendment is withdrawn.

The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 4513

Mr. THOMPSON. I urge the adoption of the pending Thompson amendment, No. 4513.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 4513) was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. REID. It is my understanding, under the order previously entered, the Senator from West Virginia is now in order to offer an amendment; is that the order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from West Virginia if he intends to do that tonight or tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I would rather not do it tonight.

Mr. REID. I say to the two managers of the bill, Senator BYRD, who has been involved in the Interior bill all day, indicated he would rather that he lay it down in the morning, when we get back on the bill tomorrow.

I ask the two managers, is that appropriate?

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I have no objection whatsoever. We will look forward to a good, hearty debate on Senator BYRD's amendment tomorrow.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no objection, Mr. President.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum—I withhold that request.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank both Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I also need to get home. My wife is recuperating from an appendectomy and doing very well. I think I need to go home. I thank both Senators for their understanding and consideration.

Mr. REID. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAYTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

TRIBUTE TO VICE ADMIRAL NORBERT ROBERT RYAN, JR.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I rise today to honor Vice Admiral Norbert Robert Ryan, Jr., United States Navy, who will retire on Sunday, December 1, 2002, after 35-years of faithful service to our Nation.

Hailing from Mountainhome, PA, Vice Admiral Ryan graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy in 1967. Following graduation he attended flight training and was designated a Naval Aviator in 1968. After completing additional technical training, he spent three years with Patrol Squadron EIGHT conducting antisubmarine warfare patrols during the height of the Cold War.

Returning to the Naval Academy from 1972 to 1975, Vice Admiral Ryan helped shape future Navy leaders while serving as a Company Officer and Midshipman Personnel Officer. While at the Academy he concurrently attended graduate school, earning a Master of Science degree in Personnel Administration from George Washington University.

In 1975, Vice Admiral Ryan returned to the fleet, commencing a period of nine straight years of sea-duty assignments in which he served on a Carrier Group Commander's staff and flew P-3 Orion aircraft in three different Patrol Squadrons, including service as the Commanding Officer of Patrol Squadron FIVE. From 1984 to 1986, he was assigned as the Operations Officer on the staff of Commander, Patrol Wing ELEVEN and then as Force Operations Officer for Commander, Patrol Wings, Atlantic.

After serving two years as the Administrative Assistant to the Chief of Naval Operations, Vice Admiral Ryan completed studies at the John F. Kennedy School of Government, Senior Officer National Security Program, enroute to command of Patrol Wing TWO.

From 1991 to 1993, Vice Admiral Ryan served as Executive Assistant to the Vice Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff. During the period of 1993–1995, he was assigned to the Bureau of Naval Personnel, first as Director for Total Force Programming and then as Director for Distribution.

Vice Admiral Ryan returned to the fleet as Commander Patrol Wings Pacific/Commander Task Force 12 and then to the Pentagon where he performed superbly as the Navy's Chief of Legislative Affairs, serving in that important post from 1996 to 1999.

In November 1999, Vice Admiral Ryan assumed duties as Chief of Naval Personnel/Deputy Chief of Naval Operations, Manpower and Personnel. In this position, he distinguished himself through exceptionally meritorious service as he expertly developed and executed a visionary Navy personnel strategy, dynamic assignment system placement improvements, intelligent manpower allocations and many carefully crafted quality of life initiatives. His relentless efforts directly provided an unprecedented level of personnel readiness throughout the Navy.

A leader by example, Vice Admiral Ryan fostered creative concepts for taking care of people by applying focused mentoring and one-on-one leadership with the individual Sailor foremost in mind. He was the driving force that positioned the Navy's human resource organization for optimum support of the Service's needs. A true visionary, he supported manpower reform, new Fleet personnel requirements, and innovation in personnel management and manpower preparation for new operational platforms and weapons systems.

During his tenure as Chief of Naval Personnel, Vice Admiral Ryan oversaw unprecedented success in quality of life enhancements for all Navy men and women and their families. These enhancements included the establishment and improvement of cost-efficient and extremely effective recruiting and reenlistment incentives, implementation of the Thrift Savings Plan, expansion of life insurance benefits to active duty family members and improvements to the process by which Sailors receive housing allowances. His actions maintained sensitivity to Fleet requirements while being ever mindful of our most vital asset—the Sailor.

Vice Admiral Ryan's leadership, intelligent stewardship and exceptional commitment to all naval personnel stand to ensure the success of our Navy well into the 21st Century. He is an individual of uncommon character and his professionalism will be sincerely missed. I ask my colleagues on both side of the aisle to rise with me to thank Vice Admiral Norb Ryan for his honorable service in the United States Navy, and to wish him and his family fair winds and following seas as he closes his distinguished military career. We also wish Norb Ryan and his wife, Judy, success, happiness, and good health as he takes the helm as President of The Retired Officer's Association.

JUDICIAL NOMINATIONS

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, last week, the Senate confirmed the 74th, 75th, 76th, and 77th judicial nominations from President George W. Bush. We have confirmed more of President Bush's nominees in less than 15 months than were confirmed in the last 30 months that a Republican majority controlled the Senate and the pace of judicial confirmations. We have done more in half the time. We have also already confirmed more of President George W. Bush's judicial nominations since July 2001, than were confirmed in the first two full years of the term of his father President George H.W. Bush.

We are recognizing Hispanic Heritage Month and this week I understand that the Congressional Hispanic Caucus has a number of meetings and events planned. It seems a good time to take stock of where we are with regard to judicial nominees who are Hispanic.

I am informed that out of all of President George W. Bush's judicial nominations less than 10 are Hispanic or Latino; indeed, the percentage of nominees who are Hispanic is approximately 6 percent, which is, or course, less than half of the percentage of Hispanics in the population of the United States. Earlier this year the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund issued a report "Opening the Courthouse Doors: The Need for More Hispanic-American Judges." The report urged the President to take action to address the persistent problem of Hispanic under-representation in Federal judgeships by nominating "qualified Hispanic candidates who have also had a demonstrated interest and a meaningful involvement in the work and activities of the Hispanic community." I regret that the President has not heeded this recommendation.

President Clinton nominated more than 30 Hispanic candidates for judicial vacancies. Unfortunately, some of them were denied hearings and votes during the years in which a Republican majority controlled the Senate process. Qualified, mainstream Hispanic nominees such as Christine Arguello of Colorado, Enrique Moreno of Texas, and Jorge Rangel also of Texas, who were nominated to circuit courts and Anabelle Rodriguez of Puerto Rico and Ricardo Morado of Texas, who were nominated to district courts, were defeated without a hearing or a vote. Others, such as Judges Rosemary Barkett of Florida, Sonia Sotomayor of New York, Carlos Lucero of Colorado, Jose Cabranes of Connecticut, Kim Wardlaw of California, Fortunado Benavides of Texas, and Richard Paez of California who were nominated to the circuit courts were eventually confirmed, many after lengthy delays by Republicans and Republicans' efforts to vote down their nominations.

For example, three of President Clinton's first 14 judicial nominees were Hispanic. One of them, Judge Barkett of Florida, who was nominated to the Eleventh Circuit, was targeted by Republicans for defeat based on their claims about her judicial philosophy or ideology. Despite numerous procedural efforts by Republicans, then in the minority, to delay and defeat her nomination, Judge Barkett was eventually confirmed. Although she had received a unanimous "Well Qualified" rating from the ABA, 36 Republicans voted against her confirmation.

Once Republicans took over the Senate in 1995, they slowed down the confirmation process dramatically, especially for circuit court nominees. They delayed the confirmation of Judge Sotomayor to the Second Circuit and tried to defeat her nomination because the Republican leadership feared she could be elevated to the Supreme Court. Even though Judge Sotomayor, like Judge Barkett, received a unanimous "Well Qualified" rating from the ABA, 29 Republicans voted against her confirmation on grounds of judicial philosophy or ideology. Republicans also delayed the confirmation of Judge Richard Paez for over 1,500 days, and after numerous procedural efforts to defeat his nomination through delay, Republicans mustered 39 votes against his confirmation.

Other Hispanic nominees, like Judge Fuentes who was nominated to the Third Circuit, had to wait a year to be confirmed. This was not because Republicans were busy confirming other circuit court nominees. In the 15 months after he was nominated, Republicans allowed only seven circuit court nominees to be confirmed. In contrast, the Democratic-led Senate has confirmed 13 of this President's circuit court nominees in less than 15 months, and two others are awaiting a vote on the floor.

President Clinton also appointed Judge Ricardo Urbino to the District Court in D.C., Judges Daniel Dominguez, Salvador Casellas, and Jay Garcia Gregory to the District Court in Puerto Rico, Judge Victor Marrero to the District Court in the Southern District of New York, Judges David Briones, Orlando Garcia, and Hilda Tagle to the District Courts in Texas, Judges Mary Murguia and Frank Zapata to the District Courts in Arizona, Judge Carlos Murguia to the District Court in Kansas, and Judge Adalberto Jordan to the District Court in Miami. Republicans delayed on a number of Hispanic nominees to the District Courts, including Judge Tagle who waited more than 30 months to be confirmed while Ms. Rodriguez waited more than 30 months to never be confirmed during the period of Republican control of the Senate.

In contrast, rather than reflecting the growing Hispanic population and increasing numbers of qualified Hispanic lawyers who are potentially judicial nominees, the Bush Administration's nominations have resulted in very few Hispanic judicial nominees compared to the Clinton Administration. President Bush has chosen only 8 Hispanics out of the 128 judicial nominations he has made. That is most regrettable.

Since the change in majority, we have moved quickly on the few Hispanic nominees who have been forwarded by this White House. Judge Christina Armijo was confirmed in May, 2001. Judge Phillip Martinez was confirmed last September. Judge Randy Crane was confirmed in March. Judge Jose Martinez was confirmed last week. Magistrate Judge Alia Ludlum, who was nominated in July and whose ABA peer review was recently received, is participating in a confirmation hearing this week. Unfortunately, because the White House nominated Judge James Otero and Jose Linares in July and August and has changed the 50-year tradition regarding ABA peer reviews, the ABA peer reviews on these recent nominees have not been received or they, too, would have had hearings. Each of the other Hispanic nominees to federal trial courts participated in a confirmation hearing within 60 days of having a completed file. In addition, I am planning another confirmation hearing to include Miguel Estrada.

Thus, Democrats will have held hearings on every Hispanic judicial nominee submitted by the President who has a completed file. The Democratic majority has proceeded to vote to confirm every Hispanic district court nominee who has had a hearing. Moreover, we have proceeded without the years of delay that used to accompany consideration of minority judicial nominees.

In "Justice Held Hostage," the bipartisan Task Force of Federal Judicial Selection of the Citizens for Independent Courts, co-chaired by Mickey Edwards and Lloyd Cutler, reported that during the period of Republican control of the Senate judicial nominees who were ethnic minorities or women took longer to get considered by the Senate, were less likely to be voted on and less likely to be confirmed—if they were considered at all by the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee.

I recall all too well the months and years it took for the Republican-controlled Senate to confirm Hispanic judicial nominees like Judge Sotomayor, Judge Paez, and Judge Tagle, in addition to other women or minorities like Judge Margaret Morrow, Judge Marsha Berzon, Judge Ann Aiken, Judge Margaret McKeown, and Judge Susan Oki Mollway. I also recall the numerous women and people of color who were nominated to the federal bench by President Clinton but who were never given hearings by the Republicans, like Judge Roger Gregory, Judge Helene White, Jorge Rangel, Enrique Moreno, and Kathleen McCree Lewis. Judge White of the Michigan Court of Appeals waited over 1,500 days but was never given a hearing or a vote. Still others, like Bonnie Campbell, were given a hearing but never given a vote on their nominations. These are just a few of the women and minorities whose confirmations were delayed or defeated through delay.

President Clinton worked hard to increase the diversity of the federal bench and 12 percent of his appointments to the circuit courts were Latino. It would have been closer to 16 percent if all of his Hispanic nominees to the circuit courts had been accorded hearings and votes. By contrast, President Bush has nominated only one Hispanic to the dozens of circuit court vacancies that have existed during his term. Thus, as of today, 3 percent of this President's circuit court nominees are Hispanic. Between the circuit vacancies that were blocked by Republicans and the new ones that have arisen during the past 15 months, President Bush has had the opportunity to choose nominees for 41 vacancies on the circuit courts—13 of these have already been confirmed. This President has chosen only one Hispanic to fill any of these 41 vacancies, and none to any of the following vacancies: the four vacancies in the Tenth Circuit, which includes Colorado and New Mexico, among other States; the three vacancies on the Fifth Circuit, which includes Texas; the six vacancies on the Ninth Circuit, which includes California and Arizona, among other States; none to the three vacancies in the Second Circuit, which includes New York; and none to the three vacancies on the Third Circuit, which includes New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

If this White House had looked a little harder and were not so focused on packing the circuit court bench with a narrow ideology, it could have found many qualified nominees, like Enrique Moreno, Jorge Rangel, Christina Arguello and others to fill these vacancies. Instead, President Bush did not choose to re-nominate these individuals who had been unfairly blocked by members of his party, and he also withdrew the nomination of Enrique Moreno to the Fifth Circuit, a nomination that the ABA had rated "Well Qualified."

So when Republicans try to take credit for President Clinton's Hispanic nominees and try to blame Democrats for the lack of Hispanic nominees by President Bush, they should be confronted with the facts and asked why they opposed so many of President Clinton's qualified Hispanic nominees and why so many of them voted against Judge Paez and Judge Sotomayor and Judge Barkett, and why so many Hispanic nominees were delayed for years and why so many were never given hearings or votes. Of course the facts have not prevented unfounded accusations by critics of the Democratic majority. The Republican press conference accusing Senate Democrats of being anti-Hispanic was an example of such inflammatory and baseless accusations.

As the Congressional Hispanic Caucus meets this week with Hispanic leaders from across the country, I welcome their views on the few Hispanic judicial nominees sent to the Senate by the President and their help in encouraging this White House to work more closely with Senators from both political parties to nominate qualified, mainstream Hispanic nominees to the federal bench.

Our diversity is one of the great strengths of our Nation, and that diversity of background should be reflected in our federal courts. Race or ethnicity and gender are, of course, not substitutes for the wisdom, experience, fairness and impartiality that qualify someone to be a federal judge entrusted with lifetime appointments to the federal bench. White men should get no presumption of competence or entitlement. Hispanic and African American men and women should not be presumed to be incompetent. All nominees should be treated fairly, but no one is entitled to a lifetime appointment to preside over the claims of American citizens and immigrants in our federal courts. We must, of course, carefully examine the records of all nominees to such high offices, but we know well the benefits of diversity and how it contributes to achieving and improving justice in America.

VOTE EXPLANATION

Mr. BUNNING. Mr. President, I was necessarily absent for the vote in executive session on September 9, 2002. Therefore, I did not formally vote on the nomination of Kenneth A. Marra, of Florida, to be United States District Judge for the Southern District of Florida. Had I been present for that vote, I would have voted "yea" to confirm Mr. Marra for this position.

CBO COST ESTIMATE—S. 1971

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance filed a report on

S. 1971 without the Congressional Budget Office cost estimate. I ask unanimous consent that the CBO cost estimate be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE COST ESTIMATE
S. 1971—National Employee Savings and Trust Equity Guarantee Act

Summary: S. 1971 would make several changes to both the Internal Revenue Code and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) that would affect the operations and taxation of private pension plans. These include changing the requirements for diversification options, providing information to assist participants in making investment decisions, and changing the premiums paid to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation (PBGC). In addition, S. 1971 would modify the tax treatment of certain executive compensation and make other changes.

The Joint Committee on Taxation (JCT) estimates that the bill would increase governmental receipts by $437 million over the 2003–2007 period, and by $221 million over the 2003–2012 period. Most of the revenue increase would occur in 2003 ($578 million), and the bill would result in a loss of revenue from 2005 through 2010.

CBO estimates that the bill would increase direct spending by $36 million over the 2003–2007 period and by $89 million over the 2003–2012 period. Discretionary spending would also increase by $4 million over the 2003–2007 period, assuming appropriation of the necessary amounts. Because S. 1971 would affect revenues and direct spending, pay-as-you-go procedures would apply.

JCT has determined that the revenue provisions of the bill do not contain any mandates. CBO has determined that the other provisions contain no intergovernmental mandates, but they do contain several mandates on sponsors, administrators, and fiduciaries of private pension plans. CBO estimates that the direct cost of those new requirements on private-sector entities would exceed the annual threshold specified in the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act ($115 million in 2002, adjusted annually for inflation).

Estimated cost to the Federal Government: The estimated budgetary impact of the bill is shown in the following table.

This estimate assumes that S. 1971 will be enacted around October 1, 2002.

Revenues

All estimates of the revenue proposals of the bill were provided by JCT. The provisions relating to executive compensation would tax without deferral certain compensation provided through offshore trusts, and require wage withholding at the top marginal tax rate for certain supplemental wage payments in excess of $1 million. Those provisions would increase revenues by $182 million in 2003, by $402 million over the 2003–2007 period, and by $496 million over the 2003–2012 period. The pension-related provision with the largest revenue effect would alter the allowable interest rates used to calculate pension funding requirements (see discussion below). That provision would increase revenues by $62 million over the 2003–2007 period and reduce revenues by $199 million over the 2003–2012 period. Other pension provisions would reduce revenues by $1 million in 2003, by $32 million over the 2003–2007 period, and by $82 million over the 2003–2012 period.

Direct spending

Reduced Flat-Rate Premiums Paid to PBGC—Under current law, defined benefit pension plans operated by a single employer pay two types of annual premiums to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation. All covered plans are subject to a flat-rate premium of $19 per participant. In addition, underfunded plans must also pay a variable-rate premium that depends on the amount by which the plan's liabilities exceed its assets.

The bill would reduce the flat-rate premium from $19 to $5 per participant for plans established by employers with 100 or fewer employees during the first five years of the plans' operations. According to information obtained from the PBGC, approximately 7,500 plans would eventually qualify for this reduction. Those plans cover an average of 10 participants each. CBO estimates that the change would reduce the PBGC's premium income by less than $500,000 in 2003 and by $8 million over the 2003–2012 period. Since PBGC premiums are offsetting collections to a mandatory spending account, reductions in premium receipts are reflected as increases in direct spending.

Changes in Variable Premiums Paid to the PBGC.—S. 1971 would make several changes affecting the variable-rate premium paid by underfunded plans. CBO estimates, in total, this section will decrease receipts from those premiums by $9 million in 2003 and $51 million over the 2003–2012 period.

First, for all new plans that are underfunded, the bill would phase in the variable-rate premium. In the first year, the plans would pay nothing. In the succeeding four years, they would pay 20 percent, 40 percent, 60 percent, and 80 percent, respectively, of the full amount. In the sixth and later years, they would pay the full variable-rate premium determined by their funding status. On the basis of information from the PBGC, CBO estimates that this change would affect the premiums of approximately 250 plans each year. It would reduce the PBGC's total premium receipts by about $2 million in 2004 and by $41 million from 2004 through 2012.

Second, the bill would reduce the variable-rate premium paid by all underfunded plans

(not just new plans) established by employers with 25 or fewer employees. Under the bill, the variable-rate premium per participant paid by those plans would not exceed $5 multiplied by the number of participants in the plan. CBO estimates that approximately 2,500 plans would have their premium payments to the PBGC reduced by this provision beginning in 2004. As a result, premium receipts would decline by $1 million in 2004 and by $10 million over the 2004–2012 period.

Finally, the bill would alter the allowable interest rates used to calculate pension funding requirements contained in ERISA and the Internal Revenue Code, which would allow plans to become more underfunded in plan year 2001 without subjecting them to tax and other penalties. Even though most plan-year 2001 accounts will be finalized in September 2002, the new interest rate requirement would give some plans credits that may be used in plan-year 2002, which would affect premiums paid in fiscal year 2003. JCT estimates that this provision initially would cause employers to reduce pension plan contributions, but later increase these contributions until fund returns to baseline levels. Some plans subsequently would have to pay higher premiums because their reduced contributions would further increase their level of underfunding. Other plans, however, would qualify for a special exemption and not be required to pay the variable premium for plan-year 2001. Based on information from the PBGC, CBO estimates the net effect would be a decrease of $9 million in premium receipts in 2003. From 2004 through 2007, premium income would then increase, resulting in a net change in receipts of less than $500,000 over the 2003–2007 period.

Authorization for the PBGC to Pay Interest on Refunds of Premium Overpayments.—The legislation would authorize the PBGC to pay interest to plan sponsors on premium overpayments. Interest paid on overpayments would be calculated at the same rate as interest charged on premium underpayments. On average, the PBGC receives $19 million per year in premium overpayments, charges an interest rate of 8 percent on underpayments, and experiences a two-year lag between the receipt of payments and the issuance of refunds. Based on this information, CBO estimates that direct spending would increase by $3 million annually.

Substantial Owner Benefits in Terminated Plans.—S. 1971 would simplify the rules by which the PBGC pays benefits to substantial owners (those with an ownership interest of at least 10 percent) of terminated pensions plans. Only about one-third of the plans taken over by the PBGC involve substantial owners, and the change in benefits paid to owners-employees under this provision would be less than $500,000 annually.

Discretionary spending

Studies. S. 1971 would direct the PBGC, the Department of Labor, and the Department of the Treasury to undertake four studies: one regarding establishing an insurance system for individual retirement plans, one on the fees charged by individual retirement plans, one on ways to revitalize defined benefits pension plans, and one on floor-offset employee stock ownership plans. Based on the costs of studies with comparable requirements, CBO estimates these studies would cost about $4 million over the 2003–2012 period, assuming the availability of appropriated funds.

Pay-as-you-go considerations: The Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act sets up pay-as-you-go procedures for legislation affecting direct spending or receipts. The net changes in governmental receipts that are subject to pay-as-you-go procedures are shown in the following table. For the purpose of enforcing pay-as-you-go procedures, only the effects through 2006 are counted.

	By fiscal year, in millions of dollars—
	2003	2004	2005	2006	2007	2008	2009	2010	2011	2012
Changes in receipts .....	578	37	–57	–66	–55	–97	–94	–50	4	21
Changes in outlays .....	12	3	5	7	9	10	10	11	11	11

Estimated impact on state, local, and tribal governments: JCT has determined that the revenue provisions of S. 1971 contain no intergovernmental mandates as defined in the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act (UMRA).

CBO reviewed the non-revenue provisions of S. 1971 and has determined that they contain no intergovernmental mandates as defined in UMRA and would impose no costs on state, local, or tribal governments.

Estimated impact on the private sector: With only limited exceptions, private employers who provide pension plans for their workers must follow rules specified in ERISA. Therefore, CBO considers changes in ERISA that expand those rules to be private-sector mandates under UMRA. The non-revenue provisions of S. 1971 would make several such changes to ERISA that would affect sponsors, administrators, and fiduciaries of pension plans. CBO estimates that the direct cost to affected entities of the new requirements in the bill would exceed the annual threshold specified in UMRA ($115 million in 2002, adjusted annually for inflation). JCT has determined that the revenue provisions of S. 1971 do not contain any private-sector mandates.

Title I of the bill would impose restrictions on individual-account (that is, defined contribution) plans regarding assets held in the plans in the form of securities issued by the plan's sponsor. The bill would require affected plans to allow participants to immediately sell those securities that have been acquired through the employee's contributions, and to allow participants to sell certain securities acquired through the employer's contributions after three years of service with the firm. The latter requirement would be phased in over three years. CBO estimates that the added administrative and record-keeping costs of this provision would be approximately $20 million annually, with larger amounts in the first year.

Title I also would require plans to offer a range of investment options. This requirement would add little to plans' costs because many plans now abide by a safe harbor provision in ERISA that has similar requirements.

Title II of the bill would impose restrictions on plan administrators during transaction suspension periods. (Transaction suspension periods are periods of time when participants are unable to direct the investment of assets in their accounts—for example, when a plan is changing recordkeepers.) To avoid financial liability during those time periods, fiduciaries would be required to abide by certain conditions. The bill also would increase the maximum bond required to be held by fiduciaries from $500,000 to $1 million. CBO estimates that the direct cost of these provisions to plan sponsors and fiduciaries would be small.

Title III of the bill would impose a number of requirements on plans regarding information they must provide to their participants. Administrators of defined contribution plans would be required to provide quarterly statements to participants. Those statements would have to contain several items, including the amount of accrued benefits and vested accrued benefits, the value of investments held in the form of securities of the employing firm, and an explanation of any limitations or restrictions on the right of the individual to direct the investments. Currently, plans must provide more limited statements to participants upon request. CBO estimates that, while many plans now provide pension statements on a quarterly basis, about 30 million participants would begin to receive quarterly statements as a result of this bill. The added cost of this requirement would be about $100 million annually.

Title III also would require administrators of private defined-benefit pension plans to provide vested participants currently employed by the sponsor with a benefit statement at least once every three years, or to provide notice to participants of the availability of benefit statements on an annual basis. CBO estimates that the cost of this provision would be less than $5 million annually.

In addition, Title III would require plans to provide participants with basic investment guidelines and information on option forms of benefits, as well as information that plan sponsors must provide to other investors under securities laws. Plans also would have to make available on a web site any disclosures required of officers and directors of the plan's sponsor by the Securities and Exchange Commission. CBO estimates that the cost of these provisions would exceed $25 million annually.

Previous CBO estimates: CBO has prepared cost estimates for three other bills that contain provisions similar to those in S. 1971. These are:

H.R. 3669, the Employee Retirement Savings Bill of Rights, as reported by the House Committee on Ways and Means on March 14, 2002 (CBO estimate dated March 20, 2002),

H.R. 3762, the Pension Security Act of 2002, as ordered reported by the House Committee on Education and the Workforce on March 20, 2002 (CBO estimate dated April 4, 2002), and

S. 1992, the Protecting America's Pensions Act of 2002, as ordered reported by the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions on March 21, 2002 (CBO estimate dated May 7, 2002).

The major budgetary effects of H.R. 3669, like S. 1971, pertain to revenue provisions that relate to pension plan funding. (H.R. 3669 also included a provision excluding certain stock options from wages.) H.R. 3669's provisions affecting pension would produce an estimated revenue loss of $1.2 billion over the 2002–2012 period, compared with the $277 million revenue loss projected for the pension provisions of S. 1971 over the 2003–2012 period.

Like S. 1971, both H.R. 3669 and H.R. 3762 would make several changes to ERISA affecting premiums collected by the PBGC. CBO estimated that H.R. 3669 would increase direct spending by $104 million over from 2003–2012 and H.R. 3762 would increase direct spending by $185 million over the same period. Unlike S. 1971, H.R. 3762 included a provision amending the underlying formula used to determine variable rate-premiums for plan-year 2003. Also, one of the changes made by H.R. 3762 would first apply to plan-year 2002, while that provision in S. 1971 would start with plan-year 2003. Both bills also contained somewhat different language than S. 1971 affecting the interest rates used to calculate variable-rate premiums in the plan-year 2001.

S. 1992 did not have any estimated impact on either revenues or direct spending.

Estimate prepared by: Federal revenues: Annie Bartsch; Federal spending: Geoff Gerhardt; impact on state, local and tribal governments: Leo Lex; impact on the private sector: Bruce Vavrickchek.

Estimate approved by: Robert A. Sunshine, Assistant Director for Budget Analysis; G. Thomas Woodward, Assistant Director for Tax Analysis.

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 2001

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise today to speak about hate crimes legislation I introduced with Senator KENNEDY in March of last year. The Local Law Enforcement Act of 2001 would add new categories to current hate crimes legislation sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society.

I would like to describe a terrible crime that occurred March 26, 2002 in Denver, CO. A lesbian, April Mora, 17, was brutally attacked by three men. The attackers punched and kicked her in the stomach, then held her down and carved the words "dyke" and "RIP" into her flesh with a razor.

I believe that government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act of 2001 is now a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation and changing current law, we can change hearts and minds as well.

CHALLENGES IN RURAL HEALTH CARE

• Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I wanted to take a few minutes to describe some of the challenges facing rural health care systems and why I feel it is critical for the Senate to act now to reduce the inequities in Medicare funding between rural and urban providers.

Rural America depends on its small town hospitals, physicians and nurses, nursing homes, those who provide emergency ambulance services, and other members of our rural health care system. And because of past and proposed cuts in Medicare reimbursement, plus historical unfairness in Medicare payments, these vital services are in jeopardy.

Like most of my Senate colleagues, I supported the Balanced Budget Act, BBA, of 1997 when it was enacted by Congress with strong bipartisan support. Prior to the passage of this law, Medicare was projected to be insolvent by 2001, so it was imperative that we took action to extend Medicare's financial health and to constrain its rate of growth to a more sustainable level.

We later found that the Balanced Budget Act worked to reduce Medicare program costs, but many health care providers were adversely affected by payment reductions that were larger than intended. To address these concerns, Congress in 1999 made adjustments in the Balanced Budget Refinement Act, BBRA, followed in 2000 by the Medicare Beneficiary Improvement and Protection Act, BIPA. Without these needed changes, frankly, as many as a dozen of North Dakota's hospitals might be closed today.

But, additional legislation is still needed to improve Medicare reimbursement for health care providers in order to stabilize the Medicare program and ensure that beneficiaries, especially in rural areas, will continue to have access to their local hospitals, physicians, nursing homes, home health, and other services. Many small rural hospitals in particular serve as the anchor for the full range of health care services in their communities, from ambulatory to long-term care. Medicare is the single most significant payer for services at these hospitals, and as such, it has an impact on the whole community.

Part of the problem in North Dakota is simply demographics: North Dakota's population is the second oldest in the Nation, and our population is shrinking daily. In fact, in 13 of North Dakota's counties, there were 20 or fewer births for the entire county last year. Admissions to rural hospitals have dropped by a drastic 60 percent in the last two decades, and those patients who do remain tend to be older, poorer, and sicker. This means that rural hospitals tend to be disproportionately dependent upon Medicare reimbursement, to the extent that Medicare accounts for 85 percent of their revenue. Obviously, given this reality, changes in Medicare reimbursement have a major impact on the financial health of rural hospitals.

Another part of the problem is that Medicare has historically reimbursed urban health care providers at a much higher rate than their rural counterparts. Of course, some of this difference can be explained by regional differences in the cost of health care and variations in the health status of older Americans. But this is not the whole explanation. Even after adjusting for these factors, a recent report by health care economists found that, for example, Medicare's per beneficiary spending was about $8,000 in Miami, but only $3,500 in Minneapolis. When average Medicare payments for the same procedure are compared, the disparities in payment in different areas of the country are dramatic. The table below compares payments for two of the most common procedures in North Dakota: hospitalization for heart failure and shock, and hospitalization for treatment of pneumonia.

Location in U.S.	Heart Failure and Shock	Simple pneumonia
North Dakota .....	$3,079	$3,383
California .....	4,774	5,153
New York .....	4,471	5,237
District of Columbia .....	6,168	6,588

As you can see, the average payment for these same hospital procedures, in larger and more urbanized States like New York and California, is 150 percent of the Medicare payment for the same procedure in North Dakota. The average Medicare payment for these same procedures is twice as high in the District of Columbia. In my opinion, the difference is largely explained by a Medicare reimbursement system that is skewed in favor of urban area, and past legislation has done little to address that concern, despite efforts by some of us to do so.

I have cosponsored legislation in the Senate, the Area Wage and Base Payment Improvement Act, S. 885, that would address the rural inequity in Medicare reimbursement in two ways. First, this bill would equalize the "standardized payment" which forms the basis for Medicare's reimbursement to hospitals. You would think something called the "standardized payment" would already be standard, but the fact is that hospitals in rural and small urban areas, including all of North Dakota, receive a smaller standardized payment than large urban hospitals. This bill would raise all hospitals up to the same standardized payment.

Second, S. 885 would increase the wage index for most of North Dakota's hospitals. This is a major area of concern that I hear about from North Dakota hospital administrators. The current wage index, which is an important factor in a hospital's total Medicare reimbursement, is based on an antiquated theory that it costs more to hire hospital staff in urban areas than it does in rural areas. That may have been true once, but it is no longer true today. Today, hospitals in North Dakota are competing with hospitals in Minnesota, Chicago and elsewhere for the same doctors and nurses, and they have to pay competitive wages in order to recruit staff.

I am also a cosponsor of the Rural Health Care Improvement Act of 2001, S. 1030. This legislation introduced by Senator Conrad would, among other things, provide for a new "low volume" adjustment payment for hospitals with a smaller number of patients and establish a revolving loan fund to help rural health care facilities make much-needed capital improvements.

I also want to mention a positive impact of the Balanced Budget Act of 1997. That legislation created the Critical Access Hospital program, which has proven to be critically important to the survival of North Dakota's smallest and most rural hospitals. Twenty-eight of North Dakota's rural hospitals, serving about 181,000 North Dakotans, have now converted to Critical Access Hospital status, which allows them to receive cost-based reimbursement from Medicare. I strongly support continuing this program and making some modest changes to strengthen the program. We also need to reauthorize the Rural Hospital Flexibility program, which provides grants to states to assist small rural hospitals in making the switch to Critical Access Hospitals.

In addition, Congress also must make some other changes to Medicare reimbursement to head off some upcoming reductions in payments. For instance, Medicare reimbursement to physicians and allied health providers is scheduled to be reduced by 12 percent over the next three years because of problems with the payment formula. In addition, reimbursement to home health agencies is scheduled to be cut by 15 percent on October 1, and a 10 percent payment boost for rural home health agencies expires at the end of this year. And skilled nursing homes will be facing a 10 percent reduction in their Medicare payment rates in 2003 and a 19 percent cut in 2004 unless Congress acts to avert this "cliff" in funding. I support making changes in all of these areas to help address these concerns.

In closing, I think we as a Nation need to acknowledge that a strong health care system is an important part of our rural infrastructure. Over the years, we have determined that rural electric service, rural telephone service, an interstate highway system through rural areas, and rural mail delivery, to name a few services, make us a better, more unified Nation. We need to make the same determination in support of our rural health care system, and I will be fighting for policies that reflect rural health care as a strong national priority. •

ON CONSTITUTION DAY, THE WORK OF THE SENATE, AND BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I rise to note an interesting coincidence of things that are happening, and not happening, today.

Many Americans are celebrating today as Constitution Day. At 4 p.m. eastern time, on September 17, 1787, the Framers of the U.S. Constitution adjourned the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia. The Constitution they proposed, after deep debates and tortured compromise, was then submitted to the several States for ratification, and for the judgment of history.

According to the nonpartisan, non-profit organization, Constitution Day, Inc., at 4 p.m. today, "schools across America will be led in the recitation of the Preamble to the US Constitution on a national teleconferencing call conducted by Sprint . . . churches across America will be led in the ringing of their bells to honor the First Amendment, Freedom of Religion . . ." and there will be commemorations from Valley Forge, PA, to a replica of Independence Hall at Knott's Berry Farm, CA.

Little can be said, that has not been said before, about the profound wisdom, foresight, and faith that the Framers of our Constitution brought to constructing the foundational document of our Nation's system of government and laws.

President Coolidge said of the Constitution, in 1929, "The more I study it, the more I have come to admire it, realizing that no other document devised by the hand of man ever brought so much progress and happiness to humanity."

I rise to acknowledge this special day of celebrating our Constitution and I join all Americans in paying tribute to the patriots who produced it.

For many Americans, one of the signs of our deep respect for the Constitution is our acknowledgment that, in exceptional cases, a problem rises to such a level that it can be adequately addressed only in the Constitution, by way of a Constitutional amendment.

Yesterday, President Bush spoke forcefully about the Senate's failure to pass a budget resolution for the fiscal year that starts in just 14 days. He called upon us to do what was needed, urgent, and responsible, and to do it promptly, by sending him this year's defense appropriation and the homeland security bill. And in all this, the need to maintain fiscal discipline becomes evident, as we see a return to deficit spending.

For 4 years in a row, a modern record, the first time since the 1920s, Republican Congresses balanced the Federal Budget. The first Republican Congresses in 40 years made balancing the budget their top priority, and did what was necessary to run the kind of surpluses we need to pay down the national debt and safeguard the future of Social Security.

Today, the Federal budget is again written in red ink. The Congressional Budget Office's recently released budget update projects a $157 billion deficit for fiscal year 2002, the year about to end. If you don't count the Social Security surplus, the rest of the government will run a $317 billion deficit.

Under current policies, CBO says the deficit will be about the same next year, in fiscal year 2003. But we don't know today what war against terrorism will demand next year. And, unfortunately, we do know that too many in Congress and too many interest groups are demanding large increases in spending for other purposes.

This year's budget deficit was caused by an economic recession and a war begun by a terrorist attack. Even before taking office, President Bush correctly foresaw the coming recession and prescribed the right medicine, the bipartisan Tax Relief Act of 2001, that has bolstered the economy and prevented a far worse recession.

We will rebound from the recent economic slowdown. And we must do whatever it takes to win the war, that's a matter of survival and of protecting the safety and security of the American people. Beyond that, we must keep all other federal spending under control, so that we return, as soon as possible, to balancing the budget.

Even in the heady days of budget surpluses, I always maintained the only way to guarantee that the Federal Government would stay fiscally responsible was to add a Balanced Budget Amendment to the Constitution. Before we balanced the budget in 1998, the government was deficit spending for 28 years in a row and for 59 out of 67 years. The basic law of politics, to just say "yes" was not repealed in 1998, but only restrained some, when we came together and briefly faced up to the grave threat to the future posed by decades of debt.

The Government is back to borrowing. And for some, a return to deficit spending seems to have been liberating, as the demands for new spending only seem to be multiplying again.

That is why, on Constitution Day, it is important to me to be a cosponsor of S.J. Res. 2, and to call again for Congress to adopt a Balanced Budget Amendment to the Constitution and send it to the states for ratification. I also stress that this amendment would not count the Social Security surplus in its calculation of a balanced budget. Those annual surpluses would be set aside exclusively to meet the future needs of Social Security beneficiaries.

On Constitution Day, I call on the Senate to do today's work: Send the President a Defense appropriations bill, send the President a homeland security bill, and pass a budget that holds the line on new spending. And, on Constitution Day, I call on the Senate to safeguard the future, by again taking up a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

HONORING FREEDOM SERVICE DOGS

• Mr. ALLARD. Mr. President, I wish to honor the Freedom Service Dogs on the occasion of its 15th anniversary of serving people with mobility impairments by providing them with service dogs.

Freedom Service Dogs was founded by Mike Roche, a Colorado paramedic, and P.J. Roche, a dog trainer. They started the service to help Colorado citizens be more mobile by training dogs to open doors, turn on lights, pull wheelchairs, pick up dropped items, tug clothing on and off, and alert for help when needed.

Not only does Freedom Service Dogs provide people with increased confidence and social acceptance, it also saves the lives of hundreds of good dogs abandoned in animal shelters by training them to help those impaired.

Freedom Service Dogs is a charitable organization that relies on the support of the community to provide free services to those in need.

I congratulate Freedom Service Dogs for 15 years of service and commend this group and the communities that support them for creating a model organization that serves the needs of mobility impaired Coloradans. •

TRIBUTE TO TIM MONTGOMERY

• Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, the people of South Carolina could not have been more proud of Gaffney, SC, native Tim Montgomery this past week. He set a world record in the 100 meters at the IAAF Grand Prix Final in Paris with a time of 9.78 seconds, one-hundredth of a second faster than the old record.

It may surprise some of my colleagues in this body that South Carolina could produce the fastest runner in the world. They look at the races for Senate that Senator THURMOND and I have been involved with, and have probably concluded our state produces only marathoners.

But the new generation of South Carolinians excel in speed. Mr. Montgomery has demonstrated great talent as a sprinter, as the 2001 USA Outdoor champion and a gold medalist in the 2000 Olympic 4x100 relay. No question, his hard work culminated in his perfect run this past week, making him the best of the world's best.

I know every track fan in our nation joins those of us in South Carolina in congratulating Mr. Montgomery and wishing him continued success in the future.●

IN REMEMBRANCE OF THE VICTIMS OF THE KATYN FOREST MASSACRE

• Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. President, I rise today to honor the memory of the victims of the Katyn Forest Massacre in 1940.

On September 17, 1939, Soviet troops invaded Poland in accordance with the German-Soviet agreement. While Polish troops fought bravely, they ultimately were overwhelmed by the Soviet forces.

In an effort to eliminate potential threats to Soviet control of Poland, Soviet troops, under Stalin's orders, committed what some have called one of the most heinous war crimes in history. Over 15,000 Polish soldiers, officers, intellectual leaders, prisoners of war and other Polish citizens were executed. Between four and five thousand Polish bodies were buried in a mass grave in the Katyn Forest. There were no trials, no justice for these innocent victims.

While the Soviet government denied complicity, on February 19, 1989 it finally released documents confirming their role in this massacre. However, an admission of complicity does not ease the pain of a nation whose entire population was affected by this horrible event.

I am hopeful that as more people learn of the Katyn Forest Massacre, we will be able to come to terms with this tragedy and the pain that it has caused so many. We must continue to honor the memories of those who were lost that day, so that we will not be des-tinued to repeat this century the horrors which so often affected the last.●

HONORING RICHARD H. JETT

• Mr. BUNNING. Mr. President, today I wish to recognize Mr. Richard H. Jett of Campton, KY. This weekend, Mr. Jett will be honored as Kentucky's Outstanding Older Worker for 2002 at an awards ceremony hosted by Experience Works.

Mr. Jett's life is an example of selfless devotion to community improvement. He was an educator, high school principal and superintendent of schools in Kentucky until his retirement in 1982. However, Mr. Jett's idea of retirement is certainly not traditional.

Currently, the city of Campton, KY, has the privilege of calling Mr. Jett its mayor. Along with community development, the improvement and beautification of Campton is always in the forefront of his mind. One will often find Mr. Jett sweeping sidewalks or tending to the landscape, showing his pride for Campton and Kentucky. As in all areas of his life, Mr. Jett leads by example, never resting on his laurels.

Aside from his service in the public sector, Mr. Jett operates a tour company, he organized the East Kentucky Talent Project to help young musicians, and he has taught square dancing, western dancing and clogging for the past 40 years at the Natural Bridge State Park. His active lifestyle does not show signs of slowing, even after being diagnosed with cancer in 1998, and undergoing knee replacement surgery.

At a time when civic pride is not only desirable, but essential, Mr. Jett's life is an example of how we should treat our city, state, nation and fellow citizens: with upmost respect, compassion and dedication. He is truly an American Hero to the lives he touches daily. Please join me in honoring the distinguished career of Mr. Richard H. Jett.●

TRIBUTE TO JOHNNY UNITAS

• Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, today I pay tribute to a legend in the world of professional football, the late Johnny "Golden Arm" Unitas. I would also like to extend my most heartfelt condolences to his wife Sandy, his daughters Paige and Janice Ann, and his sons John, Kenneth, Robert, Christopher, Joe and Chad. I know my colleagues join me in expressing our gratitude for Johnny's many contributions.

Revered as the greatest quarterback of all time, Johnny was a man of incredible integrity and was a hero to many, both on and off the field. After graduating from St. Justin's High School in Pittsburgh, PA, where he got his start playing football as a sophomore, Johnny began to set his sights on college football. He found his niche at the University of Louisville. As quarterback for the university's football team, Johnny's skills and leadership demanded the attention of national recruiters. He was signed by the Baltimore Colts in 1956, and proved to be one of the team's greatest assets for 17 seasons.

His impressive accomplishments include throwing touchdown passes in a record 47 consecutive games and being the first quarterback in the NFL to pass a total of 40,000 yards. During his celebrated career in the NFL, Johnny received many of the game's highest awards. He was named Player of the Year in 1959, 1964 and 1967, was named Player of the Decade for the 1960s. On July 28, 1979, Johnny was enshrined into the Pro Football Hall of Fame. He was also named the Greatest Player in the First 50 years of Pro Football, was named to the NFL's 75th Anniversary Team, and had his number, 19, retired by the Baltimore Colts.

players in history. But his legacy doesn't end there. He was a down-to-earth role model who cherished interaction with teammates and younger players. In 1987, the Johnny Unitas Golden Arm Award was established in his name to honor the top senior quarterback in college football each year. Additionally, after completing his reign in the NFL, Unitas continued to visit Louisville to help his alma mater with anything he could.

I am certain that the legacy of excellence that Johnny Unitas has left will continue on, and will inspire others. On behalf of myself and my colleagues in the Senate, I offer my deepest condolences to Johnny's friends and loved ones, and express my gratitude for all he contributed to the University of Louisville, the National Football League and to our great Nation.●

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. CAMPBELL:

S. 2941. A bill to authorize grants for the establishment of quasi-judicial campus drug courts at colleges and universities modeled after State drug courts programs; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President, today I introduce the "Campus Classmate Offenders in Rehabilitation and Treatment Act."

The Campus Classmate Offenders in Rehabilitation and Treatment Act, which can also be referred to as the "Campus CORT Act," directs the Department of Justice to establish a demonstration program to provide grants and training to help our Nation's universities and colleges establish new quasi-judicial systems. These systems aim at countering the serious drug and substance abuse related problems that are taking such a heavy toll on our institutions of higher learning and the students who attend them. The demonstration program, which would be administered by the Department of Justice's Office of Justice Programs, would be based on the valuable lessons and successes we have garnered from our Nation's innovative and expanding drug court system.

Specifically, this demonstration program legislation would authorize the establishment of up to five Campus CORTs each year for Fiscal Years 2003 through 2006. The bill authorizes the Office of Justice Programs to provide $2,000,000 in Federal funding during each of those years to help get five Campus CORTs well trained, soundly established and up and running. This new program's approach should be similar to how the Office of Justice Programs currently runs the ongoing drug court grant-making program, including providing an Internet-based application process.

There are plenty of good reasons to take the next step and establish a Campus CORTs program based on the drug court model. Since they first appeared in 1989, drug courts have rapidly spread all across the Nation. Rather than simply locking-up nonviolent drug offenders in prison along side violent criminals, drug courts provide the alternative of court-supervised treatment. Instead of simply punishing, drug courts help get people clean.

Drug courts' many successes are underscored both by the bipartisan support they have received in Congress and by the Bush Administration. For example, during a national conference hosted this last April by the National Association of Drug Court Professionals, both Office of National Drug Control Policy Director John Walters, our Nation's "Drug Czar," and Drug Enforcement Agency Director Asa Hutchinson gave speeches in support of drug courts.

According to the latest statistics as reported by the Department of Justice's Office of Justice Programs, there are nearly 700 Drug Courts in operation all across the United States. This includes 483 Adult Drug Courts, 167 Juvenile Drug Courts, and 37 Family Drug Courts. An additional 400-plus new Drug Courts are in the planning process. The report goes on to state that approximately 220,000 adults and 9,000 juveniles have been enrolled in the drug court system and of those, 73,000 adults and 1,500 juveniles have graduated.

The merits of the drug court system are well documented. Nationwide, the drug courts have helped more than 1,000 to be born drug free, more than 3,500 parents to regain custody of their children, and 4,500 parents to resume making their child-support payments. The retention rate is over 70 percent, with 73 percent of the participants managing to keep their jobs or successfully find new work. These are encouraging successes, and not just for the individuals involved, but for society as a whole.

These are the kind of successes we should be able to see once the drug court model is customized and applied through Campus CORTs as we work together to respond to the alcohol, drug and other substance abuse challenges facing our Nation's colleges and universities.

Our Nation's drug courts use a carrot and stick approach where offenders can either live at home and remain free to work under court supervised treatment or face the very real threat of hard jail time. Similarly, Campus CORTs will give troubled students the chance to get supervised treatment and stay clean or get kicked out of school and watch their futures get squandered away.

Instead of simply booting students with substance abuse problems directly out of school, as is currently happening at many universities and colleges all across the country, I believe we should instead help provide institutions of higher learning with new tools they can use to help students get and stay clean. Of course, just like it is with the existing drug courts, there will be some students who simply do not respond to Campus CORTs. While those students will have to face the fact that they may well be expelled from school, at least we will have been able to give them the opportunity to clean-up their act.

Since the new Campus CORTs would be established at colleges and universities, the legislation calls on the Office of Justice Programs, or OJP, to establish new "quasi-judicial standards and procedures for disciplinary cases" for institutions of higher learning that wish to participate in the new Federal program.

Today, I am pleased to highlight that one of the leading institutions of higher learning in my home State, Colorado State University, CSU, has already broken new ground as the Nation's first university to apply the drug court concept in a campus setting. The "Day IV" program, as it is known at CSU, has racked-up a successful record in helping keep students clean and in school.

Under the pioneering leadership of Cheryl Asmus, the drug court inspired program helped 26 out of 30 students who would have otherwise been kicked out of school stay there during the last spring semester alone. As I understand it, two of the four were dismissed from school for not meeting the Day IV program's treatment requirements and the other two left school for other reasons.

In any case, a success rate approaching 90 percent is a wonderful accomplishment, both for the university and especially for the 26 students who have managed to pull themselves back from potential disaster.

Our drug court system is making a difference all across our Nation. In fact, a 2002 report issued by Columbia University's prestigious National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse states that "drug courts provide closer, more comprehensive supervision and much more frequent drug testing and monitoring during the program, than other forms of community supervision." The report underscores that "drug use and criminal behavior are substantially reduced while offenders are participating in drug court" and that "criminal behavior is lower after participation, especially for graduates."

Far too many of our Nation's college students are falling by the wayside as they get sidetracked by crippling drug and alcohol abuse problems. Not only are academic careers being impacted and ended, entire lives are being thrown into limbo.

Our Nation's drug court system is a good example of a viable and productive partnership between the Federal Government, our State governments and local jurisdictions. Their collaboration is making a positive impact all across our country. I want to take this moment to thank the people of the OJP, the experts at the National Association of Drug Court Professionals and the State and local judges, prosecutors, law enforcement officers and other officials who have done so much to establish, build upon and continually improve our Nation's drug court system.

I also want to take a moment to thank Judge Karen Freeman Wilson, Chief Executive Officer of the National Association of Drug Court Professionals, Stuart VanMeveren, District Attorney for Colorado's Eighth Judicial District, and Colorado State University President Albert Yates for their letters of support for the Campus CORT legislation I am introducing today. Their support for this bill is appreciated.

I ask unanimous consent that the three letters of support and the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the additional material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2941

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Campus Classmate Offenders in Rehabilitation and Treatment Act" or the "Campus CORT Act".

SEC. 2. ESTABLISHMENT OF CAMPUS DRUG COURTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Attorney General, acting through the Office of Justice Programs, is authorized to make demonstration grants to accredited universities and colleges to establish not to exceed 5 campus classmate offenders in rehabilitation and treatment programs (referred to as "Campus CORTs") each fiscal year modeled after the statewide local drug court programs throughout the United States.

(b) CAMPUS CORTS.—Campus CORTs shall—

(1) be established at accredited colleges or universities;

(2) have jurisdiction over substance abuse related disciplinary cases involving students that may or may not be criminal in nature, including illegal drug use, abuse of prescription drugs, alcohol abuse, and other issues, but no student who is deemed to be a danger to the community may be involved;

(3) pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Attorney General, establish appropriate quasi-judicial standards and procedures for disciplinary cases; and

(4) impose as the ultimate sanction expulsion from school.

(c) CONSULTATION.—The Attorney General shall consult with the National Association of Drug Court Professionals, d.b.a., the National Drug Court Institute, universities and colleges, including the Campus Drug Court program at Colorado State University, and other experts in establishing quasi-judicial standards required by this Act.

(d) ASSISTANCE.—The Attorney General shall make grants to qualified universities and colleges, the National Association of Drug Court Professionals, d.b.a., the National Drug Court Institute, and other associations and experts to assist in establishing campus drug courts and provide training and technical assistance in support of the program.

(e) GRANT MAKING CONSIDERATIONS.—In awarding grants to qualified colleges or universities, the Office of Justice Programs should—

(1) endeavor to include colleges and universities of different sizes across the United States; and

(2) enable colleges and universities to apply for grants through the Internet site of the Office of Justice Programs.

SEC. 3. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated $2,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 2003 through 2006 to carry out this Act.

AUGUST 23, 2002.

Senator BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CAMPBELL: As the representative of the National Association of Drug Court Professionals (NADCP) and of the drug court professionals throughout the country I am writing this letter of support for your bill for the "Campus Classmate Offenders in Rehabilitation and Treatment Act" or the "Campus CORT Act." Modeled after the "campus drug court" at Colorado State University, campus drug courts nationwide are the exciting next step in the drug court arena. I truly appreciate your commitment to making them a reality.

All of the drug court professionals across America laud the depth of your knowledge about substance abuse and its concomitant crime and appreciate your steadfast support of stopping the revolving door of drug addiction and crime in our criminal justice system. With the alarming news about drug use and binge drinking on college campuses, the Campus CORT Act will face the campus drug and alcohol use and abuse problem head on, preventing accidents and crimes at colleges and universities throughout the nation.

Taking the drug court concept to this next level, to college campuses, is the logical way to further the fight against substance abuse and criminal behavior. As you know, Columbia University's prestigious National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse (CASA) report from 2001 states that drug courts provide closer, more comprehensive supervision and much more frequent drug testing and monitoring during the program, than other forms of community supervision. In addition, it found that drug use and criminal behavior are substantially reduced while offenders are participating in drug court.

Again, thank you for introducing the "Campus CORT Act" and for your continuing support of drug courts. I look forward to continuing to work with you and your staff in the future.

Very truly yours,

Judge KAREN FREEMAN WILSON (ret.),
Chief Executive Officer.

OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
EIGHTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT, STATE
OF COLORADO,

Fort Collins, CO, August 28, 2002.

Hon. BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL,
U.S. Senate,
Fort Collins, CO.

DEAR SENATOR CAMPBELL: I wholeheartedly support your proposed "Campus CORT Act."

As you know, Colorado State University, through the work of Dr. Cheryl Asmus and others, has developed a Campus Drug Court that is now in full operation. Prior to the implementation of the CSU Campus Drug Court, many bright, promising college students lost their opportunity to obtain their college degree because of being dismissed from school as a result of a drug or alcohol addiction. This new pilot program provides students who have drug or alcohol problems a process in which they can address their usage problem while staying in school. Colorado State University's project has proven very successful. Very few students in the program have failed to abide by the program requirements. Most participants have been able to abstain from usage. This success is due to the very strong impetus for students to "stay clean" by allowing them to continue to have access to grants and loans, as well as remain at the university so long as they abide by drug court requirements.

Federal legislation that creates funding to expand the campus drug court program is an excellent proposal. This program helps promising young people, who have chosen to improve their lives through a college education, succeed when alcohol and drugs may be the one obstacle that stands in their way. They are given the opportunity to stay in school, graduate, and become contributing members of society. That success is insured by addressing a drug or alcohol addiction problem that very well would have a negative affect on their families and their ability to succeed professionally.

The availability of federal funds to assist in starting these programs across the country has the promise of spawning very successful drug and alcohol programs nationwide. The traditional Drug Court concept has been very successful. The Campus CORT Act can provide the resources that will result in the same success opportunity for students at our colleges and universities.

We wish you every success in your efforts to pass this legislation. If there is anything I can do to assist, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

STUART A. VANMEVEREN,
District Attorney.

COLORADO STATE UNIVERSITY,
Fort Collins, CO, September 4, 2002.

Hon. BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington DC.

DEAR SENATOR CAMPBELL: This letter serves as strong support for the bill you are proposing to introduce to the United States Senate that will authorize the appropriation of funds to establish "drug courts" at other colleges and universities. These drug courts will be modeled after the Drug Courts Program, and the Colorado State University (CSU) campus drug court. I understand that CSU will play a critical role as consultant to the Attorney General of the United States in this effort, and we are committed to working in any capacity in this effort. As the first, and only university with a campus drug court to date, we are in a unique position to provide first-hand experience and advice.

In late 1999, the Family and Youth Institute at Colorado State University set up several meetings with the CSU Office of Judicial Affairs and Colorado's Eighth Judicial District Drug Court. The result of these meetings spawned an effort to apply for support to establish a "campus drug court." In mid-2001, the Family and Youth Institute was awarded two years of support for the drug court from the U.S. Department of Education. Currently, a cross-disciplinary team meets weekly to staff the drug court students. After one semester in operation, all but four (one school dropout, two expelled from program, one positive breathalyzer) of approximately 20 students remain trouble and AOD free. So far, we have three drug court graduates and recorded improvements in the other participants in terms of grades, employment, family situations, attitudes, and behaviors.

As a Carnegie Class I research institution, CSU is poised to lead the field in determining what factors of a drug court influence their success. I am aware of the current debates across the nation of the true impacts of the 1000 plus drug courts. I am confident that by introducing the model into the world of academia, inevitably it will inevitably spur research that will result in research-based evidence to concretely address these debates and concerns.

We have found the model to be easily adaptable to our campus setting and have listed as one of our four goals to assist other campuses in developing their own campus drug courts. We are extremely grateful and appreciative you have decided to assist us in this goal. It is not an accident that Colorado State University, and Colorado, will lead in this effort. You have long championed drug courts and, in particular, the Eighth Judicial District's Juvenile Drug Court, our mentor.

A key strategy of Colorado State University is civic education renewal. A part of this strategy is to focus on initiatives and programs that assist students in developing into people of integrity and strong values. We are also dedicated to the ability to graduate students in four years who are prepared to enter the world as contributing citizens. Using dismissal or expulsion as a consequence for someone with a substance abuse problem is a quick fix for our campus, but not for the individual or the community at large. As a land-grant institution, valuing service to our society, we believe the integration of drug court's goal of using treatment with strong interventions into the disciplinary system, as an alternative to dismissal or expulsion directly supports the mission of Colorado State University.

Sincerely,

ALBERT C. YATES,
President.

By Mr. CRAPO (for himself, Mr. BAYH, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. MILLER, Mr. MCCAIN, and Mr. BUNNING)

S. 2942. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to eliminate the five-month waiting period in the disability insurance program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce important legislation that will correct a serious flaw in the Social Security Disability Insurance program, which currently forces many Americans who are diagnosed with a terminal illness to live out their final days in poverty.

Under current law, any eligible individual applying for SSDI benefits must wait 5 full months before he or she can begin receiving benefits. I appreciate the support of Senator BAYH, Senator SPECTER, Senator MCCAIN, and Senator MILLER for this bill that will eliminate the waiting period for those individuals with terminal illnesses.

Far too often, I have had terminally ill constituents contact me through my State offices with horror stories about their personal experiences. These people are healthy, hard-working members of our society. Suddenly, they are told by their doctor that they have a terminal illness and that it would be best if they stop working and go on disability as soon as possible to maintain their strength. However, because of the waiting period, before they know it, these people are several months behind in their bills. Others, unfortunately, do not even live through the full waiting period.

I am sure that if any of my colleagues were to contact their State offices and speak to their staff that handle these disability cases, they would find that their constituents have faced similar difficulties with this waiting period. Like every other hard-working American, these terminally ill individuals have all paid into the Social Security system throughout their working lives, with the expectation that future benefits would be there to supplement lost income should a disability or serious illness ensue.

I am please that this legislation has the support of the National Association for the Terminally Ill. This organization's primary mission is to assist individuals diagnosed with a terminal illness, whose life expectancy is two years or less. They have told me of the many individuals that have come to them for assistance, faced with no income, while waiting through those 5 months before receiving disability benefits. Frequently, the association is contacted by people who are forced to sell furniture, cars, family heirlooms, and even their homes, just to pay expenses for daily living.

Two years ago, this Congress did the right thing by waiving the 24-month waiting period for Medicare coverage for individuals diagnosed with Lou Gehrig's Disease. The time has now come for Congress to take the appropriate action to relieve part of what is already an unthinkable burden on all terminally ill individuals.

I invite my colleagues to join us in this effort and I hope the Senate will proceed expeditiously with this important legislation that will provide relief for tens of thousands of working Americans. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. FEINGOLD (for himself,
Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HARKIN, Mr.
LEAHY, and Mr. ENZI):

S. 2943. A bill to amend title 9, United States Code, to provide for greater fairness in the arbitration process relating to livestock and poultry contracts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I rise today with my friend from Iowa to introduce legislation to give farmers options in identifying a forum to resolve disputes with agribusinesses.

This legislation is based on our amendment to the Senate-passed Farm Bill that was unfortunately stripped in the conference committee. Our amendment passed by a vote of 64-31, yet it was ultimately taken out due to objections by large agribusiness companies in the backroom negotiations.

While our effort then was not successful, I am hopeful that we will be able to pass this legislation and begin to give farmers a fair shot in the marketplace.

I am deeply concerned that the concentration of power in the hands of a few large agribusiness firms, companies that can raise a billion dollars on Wall Street at the drop of a hat, is forcing farmers and ranchers to be placed at a competitive disadvantage in the marketplace.

These large corporations are using their market power to force independent producers into a position of weakness through unfair contracts and other uses of market leverage.

In some cases, the domestic marketplace has become almost noncompetitive for the family farmer. Farmers have fewer buyers and suppliers than ever before. One indication of this dominance is one-sided contracts that favor agribusinesses at the expense of farmers and ranchers.

It is of paramount importance that we help restore competition in rural America. One way to promote competition is to ensure that farmers have a choice of forums to resolve disputes with agribusinesses.

While alternative methods of dispute resolution such as arbitration can serve a useful purpose in resolving disputes between parties, I am extremely concerned about the increasing trend of stronger parties to a contract forcing weaker parties to waive their legal rights and agree to arbitrate any future disputes that may arise.

It recently came to my attention that large agribusiness companies often present producers with "take it or leave it" contracts, which increasingly include mandatory and binding arbitration clauses. This practice forces farmers to submit their disputes with packers and processors to arbitration.

As a result, farmers are required to waive access to judicial or administrative forums, substantive contract rights, and statutorily provided protections. In short, this practice violates the farmers' fundamental due process rights and runs directly counter to basic principles of fairness.

Arbitration is billed as an inexpensive alternative to civil lawsuits. The opposite, however, is often the case. Filing fees and other expenses in arbitration result in much higher costs for the parties than civil actions. Attorney fees, whether hourly or contingency, are similar regardless of forum.

For example, in a recent Mississippi case, filing fees for a poultry grower to begin an arbitration proceeding were $11,000. This is far more than the $150 to $250 cost of filing in civil court. It makes no sense for a farmer to seek payment for wrongdoing when he or she has lost $10,000, when it costs $11,000 just to get the case before an arbitrator.

The practical result of these mandatory arbitration clauses is that farmers have no forum in which to bring their dispute against the company. Arbitration clauses require farmers to waive their right to a jury trial and bring a dispute only in a forum that may be cost-prohibitive. Farmers, who likely have substantial debts due to low prices and large mortgages on their farms, are often left without any recourse even in a case where the agribusiness has plainly acted illegally.

With the litigation option taken away by contract and the arbitration forum taken away by economics, the grower has no forum in which to bring his or her dispute against the company. The net result of these mandatory arbitration clauses is that the farmer always loses.

If poultry farmers lose their farms as a result of a mis-weighted animal, they should have the right to hold the company accountable. When farmers are hurt because they have received bad feed, we must ensure that they are able to choose the forum through which they can resolve their concerns.

If farmers believe they have been provided diseased animals from an agribusiness, they should at least have a forum in which to voice their concerns.

In short, we must give farmers a fair choice that both parties to an agricultural contract may willingly and knowingly select. This legislation therefore does not prohibit arbitration. It simply ensures that the decision to arbitrate is truly voluntary and that the rights and remedies provided for by our judicial system are not waived under coercion.

I urge my colleagues to join me in this legislation and give farmers options to resolve disputes in the agriculture marketplace.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

By Mr. WYDEN (for himself, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. ALLEN, Ms. LANDRIEU, and Mrs. CLINTON):

S. 2945. To authorize appropriations for nanoscience, nanoengineering, and nanotechnology research, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing the 21st Century Nanotechnology Act. This bill would authorize a coordinated interagency program that will support long-term nanoscale research and development leading to potential breakthroughs in areas such as materials and manufacturing, nanoelectronics, medicine and healthcare, environment, energy, chemicals, biotechnology, agriculture, information technology, and national and homeland security. Building on the National Nanotechnology Initiative, the bill would authorize appropriations for research throughout the government while providing tools for better cross-agency management and coordination.

Nanotechnology is the science and technology of building electronic circuits and devices from single atoms and molecules on a scale of one one-billionth of a meter. It will one day change the way Americans live.

I am convinced that this so-called “small science” is the next big thing” in technology. The world is on the cusp of a nanotechnology revolution that will change our lives on a scale equal to, if not greater than, the computer revolution. The United States could miss that revolution if our nanotechnology work remains uncoordinated and scattered across a half-dozen Federal agencies. That would be tragic on several levels, from scientific to social to economic.

I am determined that the United States will not miss, but will mine the opportunities of nanotechnology. To do this, I want America to marshal its various nanotechnology efforts into one driving force to remain the world's leader in this burgeoning field. And I believe Federal support is essential to achieving that goal.

The legislation I am pleased to be introducing today with Senator LIEBERMAN will provide a smart, accelerated, and coordinated approach to nanotechnology research, development, and education. In my view, there are three major steps America must take to ensure the highest success for its nanotechnology efforts.

First, a National Nanotechnology Research Program should be established to coordinate long-term fundamental nanoscience and engineering research. The program's goals will be to ensure America's leadership and economic competitiveness in nanotechnology, and to make sure ethical and social concerns are taken into account alongside the development of this discipline.

Second, the Federal Government should support nanoscience through a program of research grants, and also through the establishment of nanotechnology research centers. These centers would serve as key components of a national research infrastructure, bringing together experts from the various disciplines that must intersect for nanoscale projects to succeed. As these research efforts take shape, educational opportunities will be the key to their long-term success. As chairman of the Commerce Committee's Science, Technology, and Space Subcommittee, I have already laid out a challenge to triple the number of people graduating with math, science and technology degrees. Today, I commit to helping students who would enter the field of nanotechnology. This discipline requires multiple areas of expertise. Students with the drive and the talent to tackle physics, chemistry, and the material sciences simultaneously deserve all the support we can offer.

Third, the government should create connections across its agencies to aid in the coordination of nanotechnology efforts. These could include a national coordination office, and a Presidential Nanotechnology Advisory Committee, modeled on the President's Information Technology Advisory Committee.

I also believe that at these organizational support structures are put into place, rigorous evaluation must take place to ensure the maximum efficiency of our efforts. The bill would call for an annual review of America's nanotechnology efforts from the Presidential Advisory Committee, and a periodic review from the National Academy of Sciences. In addition to monitoring our own progress, the U.S. should keep abreast of the world's nanotechnology efforts through a series of benchmarking studies.

If the Federal Government fails to get behind nanotechnology now with organized, goal-oriented support, this nation runs the risk of falling behind others in the world who recognize the potential of this discipline. Nanotechnology is already making pants more stain-resistant, making windows self-washing and making car parts stronger with tiny particles of clay. What America risks missing is the next generation of nanotechnology. In the next wave, nanoparticles and nanodevices will become the building blocks of our health care, agriculture, manufacturing, environmental clean-up, and even national security.

America risks missing a revolution in electronics, where a device the size of a sugar cube could hold all of the information in the Library of Congress. Today's silicon-based technologies can only shrink so small. Eventually, nanotechnologies will grow devices from the molecular level up. Small though they may be, their capabilities and their impact will be enormous. Spacecraft could be the size of mere molecules.

America risks missing a revolution in health care. In my home State, Oregon State University researchers are working on the microscale to create lapel-pin-sized biosensors that use the color-changing cells of the Siamese fighting fish to provide instant visual warnings when a biotoxin is present. An antimicrobial dressing for battlefield wounds is already available today, containing silver nanocrystals that prevent infection and reduce inflammation. The health care possibilities for nanotechnology are limitless. Eventually, nanoscale particles will travel through human bodies to detect and cure disease. Chemotherapy could attack individual cancer cells and leave healthy cells intact. Tiny bulldozers could unclog blocked arteries. Human disease will be fought cell by cell, molecule by molecule, and nanotechnology will provide victories over disease that we can't even conceive today.

America risks missing a host of beneficial breakthroughs. American scientists could be the first to create nanomaterials for manufacturing and design that are stronger, lighter, harder, self-repairing, and safest. Nanoscale devices could scrub automobile pollution out of the air as it is produced. Nanoparticles could cover armor to make American soldiers almost invisible to enemies and even tend their wounds. Nanotechnology could grow steel stronger than what's made today, with little or no waste to pollute the environment.

Moreover—and this is key—America risks missing an economic revolution based on nanotechnology. With much of nanotechnology existing in a research milieu, venture capitalists are already investing $1 billion in American nanotech interests this year alone. It's estimated that nanotechnology will become a trillion-dollar industry over the next ten years. As nanotechnology grows, the ranks of skilled workers needed to discover and apply its capabilities must grow too. In the nanotechnology revolution, areas of high unemployment could become magnets for domestic production, engineering and research for nanotechnology applications—but only if government doesn't miss the boat.

The Federal Government is already making some efforts with regard to nanotechnology. The U.S. does have a National Nanotechnology Initiative. This nation has already committed substantial funds to nanotechnology research and development in the coming years. But here's my bottom line. It is essential to build on this foundation of funding with a framework for sound science over the long term. That is the reason for the legislation I am issuing today. On the framework it provides, of national coordination and strategic planning, scientists will be able to meet the grand challenges of nanotechnology. Over the long term, with Federal support, they will be able to plumb the depths of its capability, and scale the heights of its potential.

In 1944 the visionary President Franklin Delano Roosevelt requested a leading American scientist's opinion on advancing the United States' scientific efforts to benefit the world. Dr. Vannevar Bush offered his reply to President Harry S. Truman the next year, following FDR's death. In his report to the President, Dr. Bush wrote, "The Government should accept new responsibilities for promoting the flow of new scientific knowledge and the development of scientific talent in our youth. These responsibilities are the proper concern of the Government, for they vitally affect our health, our jobs, and our national security. It is in keeping also with basic United States policy that the Government should foster the opening of new frontiers and this is the modern way to do it."

Those principles, so true nearly sixty years ago, are truer still today. With the 21st Century Nanotechnology Research and Development Act, I propose that the government now accept new responsibilities in promoting and developing nanotechnology. I hope that the Senate can act swiftly on this legislation. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2945

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "21st Century Nanotechnology Research and Development Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The emerging fields of nanoscience and nanoengineering (collectively, "nanotechnology"), in which matter is manipulated at the atomic level (i.e., atom-by-atom or molecule-by-molecule) in order to build materials, machines, and devices with novel properties or functions, are leading to unprecedented scientific and technological opportunities that will benefit society by changing the way many things are designed and made.

(2) Long-term nanoscale research and development leading to potential breakthroughs in areas such as materials and manufacturing, electronics, medicine and healthcare, environment, energy, chemicals, biotechnology, agriculture, information technology, and national security could be as significant as the combined influences of microelectronics, biotechnology, and information technology on the 20th century. Nanotechnology could lead to things such as—

(A) new generations of electronics where the entire collection of the Library of Congress is stored on devices the size of a sugar cube;

(B) manufacturing that requires less material, pollutes less, and is embedded with sophisticated sensors that will internally detect signs of weakness and automatically respond by releasing chemicals that will prevent damage;

(C) prosthetic and medical implants whose surfaces are molecularly designed to interact with the cells of the body;

(D) materials with an unprecedented combination of strength, toughness, and lightness that will enable land, sea, air, and space vehicles to become lighter and more fuel efficient;

(E) selective membranes that can fish out specific toxic or valuable particles from industrial waste or that can inexpensively desalinate sea water; and

(F) tiny robotic spacecraft that will cost less, consume very little power, adapt to unexpected environments, change its capabilities as needed, and be completely autonomous.

(3) Long-term, high-risk research is necessary to create breakthroughs in technology. Such research requires government funding since the benefits are too distant or uncertain for industry alone to support. Current Federal investments in nanotechnology research and development are not grounded in any specifically authorized statutory foundation. As a result, there is a risk that future funding for long-term, innovative research will be tentative and subject to instability which could threaten to hinder future United States technological and economic growth.

(4) The Federal government can play an important role in the development of nanotechnology, as this science is still in its infancy, and it will take many years of sustained investment for this field to achieve maturity.

(5) Many foreign countries, companies and scientists believe that nanotechnology will be the leading technology of the 21st century and are investing heavily into its research. According to a study of international nanotechnology research efforts sponsored by the National Science and Technology Council, the United States is at risk of falling behind its international competitors, including Japan, South Korea, and Europe if it fails to sustain broad based funding in nanotechnology. The United States cannot afford to fall behind our competitors if we want to maintain our economic strength.

(6) Advances in nanotechnology stemming from Federal investments in fundamental research and subsequent private sector development likely will create technologies that support the work and improve the efficiency of the Federal government, and contribute significantly to the efforts of the government's mission agencies.

(7) According to various estimates, including those of the National Science Foundation, the market for nanotech products and services in the United States alone could reach over $1 trillion later this century.

(8) Nanotechnology will evolve from modern advances in chemical, physical, biological, engineering, medical, and materials research, and will contribute to cross-disciplinary training of the 21st century science and technology workforce.

(9) Mastering nanotechnology will require a unique skill set for scientists and engineers that combine chemistry, physics, material science, and information science. Funding in these critical areas has been flat for many years and as a result fewer young people are electing to go into these areas in graduate schools throughout the United States. This will have to reverse if we hope to develop the next generation of skilled workers with multi-disciplinary perspectives necessary for the development of nanotechnology.

(10) Research on nanotechnology creates unprecedented capabilities to alter ourselves and our environment and will give rise to a host of novel social, ethical, philosophical, and legal issues. To appropriately address these issues will require wide reflection and guidance that are responsive to the realities of the science, as well as additional research to predict, understand, and alleviate anticipated problems.

(11) Nanotechnology will provide structures to enable the revolutionary concept of quantum computing, which uses quantum mechanical properties to do calculation. Quantum computing permits a small number of atoms to potentially store and process enormous amounts of information. Just 300 interacting atoms in a quantum computer could store as much information as a classical electronic computer that uses all the particles in the universe, and today's complex encryption algorithms, which would take today's best super computer 20 billion years, could be cracked in 30 minutes.

(12) The Executive Branch has previously established a National Nanotechnology Initiative to coordinate Federal nanotechnology research and development programs. This initiative has contributed significantly to the development of nanotechnology. Authorizing legislation can serve to establish new technology goals and research directions, improve agency coordination and oversight mechanisms, help ensure optimal returns to investment, and simplify reporting, budgeting, and planning processes for the Executive Branch and the Congress.

(13) The private sector technology innovations that grow from fundamental nanotechnology research are dependent on a haphazard, expensive, and generally inefficient technology transition path. Strategies for accelerating the transition of fundamental knowledge and innovations in commercial products or to support mission agencies should be explored, developed, and when appropriate, executed.

(14) Existing data on the societal, ethical, educational, legal, and workforce implications and issues related to nanotechnology are lacking. To help decision-makers and affected parties better anticipate issues likely to arise with the onset and maturation of nanotechnology, research and studies on these issues must be conducted and disseminated.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, our Nation has long prided itself on being the world's premier innovator of new ideas. Over the last two and a half centuries, the uniquely American willingness to experiment with novel concepts and to chart bold directions has placed us at the forefront of scientific and technological progress. Our ability to engage in scientific exploration and to marry research findings with the development of practical applications has, in turn, enabled us to set the benchmark on virtually every indicator of human progress, from longer lifespans, to higher standards of living, to unparalleled economic productivity.

However, while past accomplishments may confer a present competitive advantage, it does not guarantee future success. We cannot afford to rest on our laurels in a world that is becoming increasingly characterized by the speed with which scientific paradigms shift and technological revolutions occur. In a global economy in which ideas and technology are the new currency, every new breakthrough represents an opportunity to claim, or, in our case, lose, global leadership.

The emerging field of nanotechnology constitutes such an opportunity. It is not just any opportunity, however, but one whose magnitude and significance locates it on the scale of harnessing electricity, creating antibiotics, building computers, or wiring up the Internet. It is, in short, a new frontier in science and technology that has the potential to transform every aspect of our lives. Nanotechnology, in fact, may have even greater potential to affect the way we live since it has such broad prospective applications in so many different areas, from medicine, to electronics, to energy. Nanotechnology is what scientists and technologists often call an “enabling” technology, a tool that opens the door to new possibilities constrained only by physics and the limits of our imaginations.

Yet, despite the enormous potential that nanotechnology offers, it is not an area in which we have assumed uncontested leadership. From an international perspective, the United States faces the danger of falling behind its Asian and European counterparts in supporting the pace of nanotechnological innovation. Other nations have grasped the fact that the first players to fully capitalize on the promise of nanotechnology have the potential to leap frog in productivity and precipitate a reshuffling in the economic, and perhaps aspects of the military, pecking order. Accordingly, they have undertaken substantial efforts to invest in nanotechnology research, and to accelerate technology transfer and commercialization. While our Nation certainly possesses the raw resources and talent to lead the world in developing this technology, it is also clear that a long-term focus and sustained commitment, as well as new collaborations between government, academia, and industry, will be needed to ensure our place at the head of the nanotechnological universe.

This is why I am so proud today to join my colleague, Senator RON WYDEN of Oregon, in introducing the 21st Century Nanotechnology Research and Development Act. This Act will build on the efforts of the National Nanotechnology Initiative, NNI, which was started under President Clinton and has received continued support under President Bush, to establish a comprehensive, intelligently coordinated program for addressing the full spectrum of challenges confronting a successful national science and technology effort, including those related to funding, coordination, infrastructure development, technology transition, and social issues.

I feel it is appropriate at this point to give credit to President Clinton for having the prescience and initiative of creating the NNI, and to applaud President Bush for expanding support for nanotechnology R&D from $270 million in FY 2000 to the $710 million targeted in his budget request for FY 2003. The NNI has been a key driver of nanotechnology in this country by bringing coherence and organization to what had previously been a scattered set of research programs within the federal government. It has, in no small part through the efforts of its spokespersons, Dr. Mike Roco and Dr. Jim Murday, achieved a higher profile for nanotechnology both within and outside the government, and gathered national attention to the importance of this field.

The time is now ripe to elevate the U.S. nanotechnology efforts beyond the level of an Executive initiative. Funding for nanotechnology will soon reach $1 billion a year, and the NNI currently attempts to coordinate programs across a wide range of Federal agencies and departments. This level of funding and the coordination challenges that arise with so many diverse participants strongly recommend having a program based in statute, provided with greater support and coordination mechanisms, afforded a higher profile, and subjected to constructive Congressional oversight and support.

Our bill closely tracks the recommendations of the National Research Council, NRC, which completed a thorough review of the NNI this past June. The NRC report stated how impressed the reviewers were with the leadership and multi-agency involvement of the NNI. Specifically, it commended the Nanoscale Science, Engineering, and Technology, NSET, subcommittee, which is the primary coordinating mechanisms of the NNI, as playing a key role in establishing research priorities, identifying Grand Challenges, and involving the U.S. scientific community in the NNI. To improve the NNI above its current level of success, the NRC made a number of recommendations. These recommendations have largely been incorporated into our bill, including establishing an independent advisory panel; emphasizing long-term goals; striking a balance between long-term and short-term research; supporting the development of research facilities, equipment, and instrumentation; creating special funding to support research that falls in the breach between agency missions and programs; promoting interdisciplinary research and research groups; facilitating technology transition and outreach to industry; conducting studies on the societal implications of nanotechnology, including those related to ethical, educational, legal, and workforce issues; and the development of metrics for measuring progress toward program goals. This legislation will also complement the provision that I authored in this year's Senate defense authorization bill, S. 2514, establishing a nanotechnology research and development program in the Department of Defense. If this provision is supported in conference, we will have matching pieces of legislation that will encompass and coordinate both civilian and defense nanotechnology programs, establishing a truly nationwide effort that leverages the expertise residing in every corner of our government.

If history teaches us anything, it is that once the wheels of innovation have stopped and stagnation has set in, mediocrity will soon follow. Nowhere in the world are those wheels of innovation spinning more rapidly than in the area of nanotechnology. This legislation provides a strong foundation and comprehensive framework that elicits contributions from all three sectors of our society in pushing nanotechnology research and development to the next level. I look forward to supporting Senator WYDEN in getting this important bill through the Congress, and encourage my colleagues to join us in setting the stage for U.S. economic growth over the next century.

SUBMITTED RESOLUTIONS

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 139—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF CONGRESS THAT THERE SHOULD BE ESTABLISHED A NATIONAL MINORITY HEALTH AND HEALTH DISPARITIES MONTH, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Mr. TORRICELLI submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. CON. RES. 139

Whereas in 2000, the Surgeon General announced a goal of eliminating, by 2010, health disparities experienced by racial and ethnic minorities in health access and outcome in 6 areas: infant mortality, cancer screening, cardiovascular disease, diabetes, acquired immunodeficiency syndrome and human immunodeficiency virus infection, and immunizations;

Whereas despite notable progress in the overall health of the Nation there are continuing health disparities in the burden of illness and death experienced by African-Americans, Hispanics, Native Americans, Alaska Natives, Asians, and Pacific Islanders, compared to the population of the United States as a whole;

Whereas minorities are more likely to die from cancer, cardiovascular disease, stroke, chemical dependency, diabetes, infant mortality, violence, and, in recent years, acquired immunodeficiency syndrome than nonminorities suffering from those same illnesses;

Whereas there is a national need for scientists in the fields of biomedical, clinical, behavioral, and health services research to focus on how best to eliminate health disparities between minorities and the population of the United States as a whole;

Whereas the diverse health needs of minorities are more effectively addressed when there are minorities in the health care workforce; and

Whereas behavioral and social sciences research has increased awareness and understanding of factors associated with health care utilization and access, patient attitudes toward health services, and behaviors that affect health and illness, and these factors have the potential to be modified to help close the health disparities gap that effects minority populations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that—

(1) a National Minority Health and Health Disparities Month should be established to promote educational efforts on the health problems currently facing minorities and other populations experiencing health disparities;

(2) the Secretary of Health and Human Services should, as authorized by the Minority Health and Health Disparities Research and Education Act of 2000, present public service announcements on health promotion and disease prevention that target minorities and other populations experiencing health disparities in the United States and educate the public and health care professionals about health disparities;

(3) the President should issue a proclamation recognizing the immediate need to reduce health disparities in the United States and encouraging all health organizations and Americans to conduct appropriate programs and activities to promote healthfulness in minority and other communities experiencing health disparities;

(4) Federal, State, and local governments should work in concert with the private and nonprofit sector to recruit and retain qualified individuals from racial, ethnic, and gender groups that are currently underrepresented in health care professions;

(5) the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality should continue to collect and report data on health care access and utilization on patients by race, ethnicity, socioeconomic status, and where possible, primary language, as authorized by the Minority Health and Health Disparities Research and Education Act of 2000, to monitor the Nation's progress toward the elimination of health care disparities; and

(6) the information gained from research about factors associated with health care utilization and access, patient attitudes toward health services, and risk and protective behaviors that affect health and illness, should be disseminated to all health care professionals so that they may better communicate with all patients, regardless of race or ethnicity, without bias or prejudice.

“SEC. ____.

“(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that:

“(1) In 2002 approximately six and one half million acres of forest lands in the United States have burned, 21 people have lost their lives, and 3,079 structures have been destroyed. The Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management have spent more than $1 billion fighting these fires.

“(2) 73 million acres of public lands are classified as class 3 fire risks. This includes 23 million acres that are in strategic areas designated by the Forest Service and the Department of the Interior for emergency treatment to withstand catastrophic fire.

“(3) The forest management policy of fire suppression has resulted in an accumulation of fuel loads, dead and dying trees, and non-native species that creates fuel ladders which allow fires to reach the crowns of large old trees and cause catastrophic fire.

“(4) The Forest Service and the Department of the Interior should immediately undertake an emergency forest grooming program to reduce the risk of catastrophic fire.

“(b) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall conduct immediately and to completion projects consistent with the Implementation Plan for the 10-year Comprehensive Strategy for a Collaborative Approach for Reducing Wildland Fire Risks to Communities and the Environment, dated May 2002, developed pursuant to the Conference Report to the Department of the Interior and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, FY 2001 (H. Rept. 106-646) to reduce hazardous fuels. Any project carried out pursuant to this section shall be consistent with the applicable forest plan, resource management plan, or other applicable agency plans.

“(c) PRIORITY.—In implementing projects under this section, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall give highest priority to—

“(1) wild and urban interface areas;

“(2) municipal watersheds; or

“(3) forested or rangeland areas affected by disease, insect activity, wind throw, or areas subject to catastrophic return.

“(d) ACREAGE LIMITATION.—In implementing this section, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall treat an aggregate area of not more than 2.5 million acres of federal land. This amount is in addition to the existing hazardous fuels reduction program that treats approximately 2.5 million acres each year.

“(e) PROCESS.—The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall jointly develop a collaborative process with interested parties consistent with the Implementation Plan described in subsection (a) for the selection of projects carried out under this section consistent with subsection (b). Such collaborative process may be the process set forth in title II of the Secure Rural Schools and Community Self-Determination Act, Public Law 106-393.

“(f) ADMINISTRATIVE PROCESS.—

“(1) REVIEW.—Projects implemented pursuant to subsection (g) shall not be subject to the appeal requirements of the Appeals Reform Act (section 322 of Public Law 102-381) or review by the Department of the Interior Board of Land Appeals. Nothing in this section affects projects for which scoping has begun prior to enactment of this Act.

“(2) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, as appropriate, may promulgate such regulations as are necessary to implement this section.

“(g) CONCLUSIVE PRESUMPTION.—Within one-half mile of any community, unless there are extraordinary circumstances, hazardous fuels reduction actions authorized by subsection (g) are conclusively determined to be categorically excluded from further analysis under the National Environmental Policy Act, and the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior, as appropriate, need not make any findings as to whether the projects individually or cumulatively have a significant effect on the human environment. This conclusive determination shall apply in any judicial proceeding brought to enforce the National Environmental Policy Act pursuant to this section.

“(h) CATEGORICAL EXCLUSIONS.—(1) Subject to paragraph (2), until September 30, 2003, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior may categorically exclude a proposed hazardous fuels reduction action, including prescribed fire, from documentation in an environmental impact statement or environmental assessment if the proposed hazardous fuels reduction action is located on lands identified as condition class 3 as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior and pursuant to scientific mapping surveys and removes no more than 250,000 board feet of merchantable wood products or removes as salvage 1,000,000 board feet or less of merchantable wood products and assures regeneration of harvested or salvaged areas.

“(2) Scoping is required on all actions proposed pursuant to this subsection.

“(i) EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCES.—For all projects implemented pursuant to this section, if there are extraordinary circumstances, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall follow agency procedures related to categorical exclusions and extraordinary circumstances.

“(j) REDUCE FIRE RISK.—In order to ensure that the agencies are implementing projects that reduce the risk of unnaturally intense wildfires, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior—

“(1) shall not construct new roads in any inventoried roadless areas part of any project implemented pursuant to this section;

“(2) shall, at their discretion, maintain an ecologically sufficient number of old and large trees appropriate for each ecosystem type and shall focus on thinning from below for all projects implemented pursuant to this section;

“(3) for projects involving key municipal watersheds, must protect or enhance water quality or water quantity available in the area; and

“(4) must deposit in the Treasury of the United States all revenues and receipts generated from projects implemented pursuant to this section.

“(k) HAZARDOUS FUELS REDUCTION FUNDING FOCUS.—In order to focus hazardous fuels reduction activities on the highest priority areas where critical issues of human safety and property loss are the most serious and within key municipal watersheds identified in forest plans, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall expend all of the hazardous fuels operations funds provided in this Act only on projects in areas identified as condition class 3 as defined in subsection (g) and at least seventy percent of the hazardous fuels operations funds provided in this Act only on projects within one-half mile of any community or within key municipal watersheds identified in forest plans. Nothing in this subsection will affect projects for which scoping has begun prior to enactment of this Act.

“(l) COMMUNITIES.—At least ten percent of the hazardous fuels operations funds provided in this Act shall be spent on projects that benefit small businesses that uses hazardous fuels and are located in small, economically disadvantaged communities.

“(m) MONITORING.—(1) The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall establish a multiparty monitoring process in order to assess a representative sampling of the projects implemented pursuant to this section.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary, in cooperation with the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Education, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of Transportation, as appropriate, shall, upon receipt of a plan acceptable to the Secretary that is submitted by an Indian tribe, authorize the tribe to carry out a demonstration project to coordinate, in accordance with the plan, the Indian behavioral health care programs of the tribe in a manner that integrates the program services involved into a single, coordinated, comprehensive program that uses, to the extent necessary, an automated clinical information system to better manage administrative and clinical services, costs, and reporting requirements through the consolidation and integration of administrative and clinical functions.

(b) USE OF FUNDS FOR TECHNOLOGY.—Notwithstanding any requirement applicable to an Indian behavioral health care program of an Indian tribe that is integrated under a demonstration project carried out under subsection (a), the Indian tribe may use funds made available under the program to purchase, lease, license, or provide training for, technology for an automated clinical information system.

SEC. 5. PROGRAMS AFFECTED.

The programs that may be integrated in a demonstration project under a plan submitted under section 4 are—

(ii) the affected agency has consented to the inclusion of the grant in the plan; or

- (4) describe the manner in which services are to be integrated and delivered and the results expected under the plan, including, if implemented, the manner and expected results of implementation of an automated clinical information system;
- (5) identify the projected expenditures under the plan in a single budget;
- (6) identify the agency or agencies in the tribe to be involved in the delivery of the services integrated under the plan;

- (c) WAIVERS.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the head of the affected Federal agency shall have the authority to waive any statutory requirement, regulation, policy, or procedure promulgated by the Federal agency that has been identified by the tribe or the Federal agency under subsection (b) unless the head of the affected Federal agency determines that such a waiver is inconsistent with—

- (1) the purposes of this Act; or
- (2) any statutory requirement applicable to the program to be integrated under the plan that is specifically applicable to Indian programs.

SEC. 8. PLAN APPROVAL.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Not later than 90 days after the receipt by the Secretary of a tribe's plan under section 4, the Secretary shall inform the tribe, in writing, of the Secretary's approval or disapproval of the plan, including any request for a waiver that is made as part of the plan.

(b) DISAPPROVAL.—If a plan is disapproved under subsection (a), the Secretary shall inform the tribal government, in writing, of the reasons for the disapproval and shall give the tribe an opportunity to amend its plan or to petition the Secretary to reconsider such disapproval, including reconsidering the disapproval of any waiver requested by the Indian tribe.

(D) the provision of, or arrangement for provision of, technical assistance to a tribe appropriate to support and implement the plan, delivered under an arrangement subject to the approval of the tribe participating in the project, except that a tribe shall have the authority to accept or reject the plan for providing the technical assistance and the technical assistance provider; and

(E) the convening by an appropriate official of the lead agency (whose appointment is subject to the confirmation of the Senate) and a representative of the Indian tribes that carry out projects under this Act, in consultation with each of the Indian tribes that participate in projects under this Act, of a meeting not less than twice during each fiscal year for the purpose of providing an opportunity for all Indian tribes that carry out projects under this Act to discuss issues relating to the implementation of this Act with officials of each agency specified in paragraph (1).

(b) REPORT REQUIREMENTS.—The single reporting format shall be developed by the Secretary under subsection (a)(3), consistent with the requirements of this Act. (2) SEPARATE RECORDS NOT REQUIRED.—Nothing in this section shall be construed as requiring a tribe to maintain separate records tracing any services or activities conducted under its approved plan under section 4 to the individual programs under which funds were authorized, nor shall the tribe be required to allocate expenditures among individual programs.

(b) OVERAGE.—All administrative costs under a plan under this Act may be commingled, and participating Indian tribes shall be entitled to the full amount of such costs (under each program or department's regulations), and no overage shall be counted for Federal audit purposes so long as the overage is used for the purposes provided for under this Act.

SEC. 15. ASSIGNMENT OF FEDERAL PERSONNEL TO STATE INDIAN ALCOHOL AND DRUG TREATMENT OR MENTAL HEALTH PROGRAMS.

Any State with an alcohol and substance abuse or mental health program targeted to Indian tribes shall be eligible to receive, at no cost to the State, such Federal personnel assignments as the Secretary, in accordance with the applicable provisions of subchapter IV of chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, may determine appropriate to help ensure the success of such program.

 FOLLOWING NOMINATION:

JOHN RODERICK DAVIS, OF ALABAMA, TO BE A MEM-BER OF THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE HENRY S TRU-MAN SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION FOR A TERM EXPIRING
 DECEMBER 10, 2005, VICE E. GORDON GEE, TERM EXPIRED,
 WHICH WAS SENT TO THE SENATE ON MAY 6, 2002.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, September 17, 2002

The House met at 12:30 p.m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. KERNS).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC,
September 17, 2002.

I hereby appoint the Honorable BRIAN D. KERNS to act as Speaker pro tempore on this day.

J. DENNIS HASTERT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Monahan, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate has passed a bill of the following title in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1777. An act to authorize assistance for individuals with disabilities in foreign countries, including victims of landmines and other victims of civil strife and warfare, and for other purposes.

MORNING HOUR DEBATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of January 23, 2002, the Chair will now recognize Members from lists submitted by the majority and minority leaders for morning hour debates. The Chair will alternate recognition between the parties, with each party limited to not to exceed 30 minutes, and each Member, except the majority leader, the minority leader, or the minority whip, limited to not to exceed 5 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SMITH) for 5 minutes.

TARIFFS ON STEEL IMPORTS

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am going to make some comments on the tariff on steel imports. President Bush approved the new tariffs on steel imports, I think to help give the steel industry and our American steelworkers a chance to make changes so that they might compete in the long term. I suspect the President, who as a young man did physical work in the oil fields, wanted to give a chance to save some of the jobs of the people that do the hard physical work in the steel industry.

However, the high tariff restrictions on steel imports have turned out to be a mistake with a potential of losing more jobs than they save. The price of steel in the United States has risen since March by 30 to 50 percent. In addition to the large price increases, there has been a reduction in the amount of steel available. This has made it impossible for many steel-consuming industries to find sufficient supplies of steel. Domestic steel producers have in many cases reneged on long-term contracts now that the steel prices have leaped, with the result that the consuming industries have been forced to pay higher than agreed-on prices or have been forced into the volatile spot market for steel.

This has harmed American workers in a number of ways. First, some American producers lose out because they are now competing with foreign companies that have access to cheaper steel. Their products become relatively more expensive because the steel in them costs our American producers more.

Second, many American firms have had trouble securing supplies of steel sufficient in quantity to keep that factory operating. I have had layoffs in my district because plants have closed for lack of steel.

Third, it gives American firms a powerful incentive to move production out of the United States to foreign plants where steel is available at the lower world market price. This is so that they can compete, so that they can survive as a company.

There are 57 workers employed in steel-using companies for every one worker in the steel-making industry. Steel-using industries account for more than 13 percent of gross domestic product, while the steel industry accounts for about one half of 1 percent. Thus, the steel tariff has threatened many more jobs than it has protected.

The Bush administration has recognized some of the distress that the steel tariffs are causing. It has issued rulings that exclude 727 products from the tariff. And, of course, this has set off a frenzy of lobbying as some of the steel-using companies angle for exemptions. This causes distortions not only in the price of domestic and foreign producers but between competing domestic producers as well.

Finally, the steel tariff encourages retaliation from our trading partners. The European Commission is now threatening retaliatory tariffs of 100 percent on a 22-page list of goods ranging from rice to grapefruit to shoes, brassieres, nuts, bib overalls, billiard tables, ballpoint pens, et cetera. The Japanese are also drawing up their steel payback list. Steel-exporting Russia has already retaliated by fencing out U.S. chicken. Hopefully that is going to be resolved.

We can ask if the tariff has done that much for the steel industry. Over the past 30 years, the Federal Government has been implementing policies to keep the steel industry in business despite its inefficiencies. These policies include voluntary quotas, antidumping, countervailing duty measures. Some of the companies have moved up and are now competitive, but much of the industry, instead of resulting in a stronger manufacturing efficiency, these policies have allowed companies to continue with production methods and labor contracts that keep it perpetually at the risk of dissolution.

Standard and Poor, for example, did not seem optimistic with the President's decision and responded to the tariffs by refusing to raise the industry's credit ratings.

The steel tariff has turned out to be a mistake that is harming many industries both in my State of Michigan and across the country. It is having the result of losing American jobs. We need to repeal this kind of tariff restriction to allow our steel-using companies to be competitive. We need to start reviewing the kind of overzealous regulations and overzealous taxation that we have put on our steel industry and we need to assist in research and technology to help allow them to be more competitive in an international market.

SPIRALING PRESCRIPTION DRUG COSTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KERNS). Pursuant to the order of the House of January 23, 2002, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN) is recognized during morning hour debates for 5 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I came to the floor today to talk about the high cost of prescription drugs, which I will, but I am moved to respond for a moment to my friend from Michigan. He should visit some of the Northeast Ohio steel mills that have run into incredible problems because of unfair foreign competition and what it has meant to jobs in communities like Loraine and Cleveland and Warren, Ohio, and other places because of dumped foreign, illegally dumped steel. And while some applauded the President's actions back several months ago, we certainly do not applaud the President selling out the steel industry after making sort of a head-fake in a political way that he is supporting the industry, and now has gone around the world promising other countries and reducing and in many cases revoking some of the tariffs that clearly have made the steel industry put in a more competitive position and in a more level playing field.

Mr. Speaker, industry experts predict that premiums for employer-sponsored health insurance will jump 13 to 24 percent next year, the third straight year of double-digit increases. What is driving the increased premiums? Mostly it is spiraling prescription drug costs.

In response to the public's outrage at astronomical drug prices, the brand name drug industry says, Not to worry, prescription drugs actually save money by reducing health care costs. If they were more reasonably priced, that would be the case. There is no doubt that prescription medicines can reduce disability, prevent illness, and help alleviate the need for other health care services. Unfortunately, drugs are priced so outrageously high that costs associated with their increased use far outstrip any offsetting savings that might accrue. They are priced so high that millions of seniors cannot afford them, and other Americans, too. Even a miracle cure is worthless if people cannot have access to it.

Skyrocketing drug prices are jeopardizing employer-sponsored health insurance, undercutting the financial security of seniors, and absorbing an enormous share of the Federal and State taxes devoted to health care.

Something has to give. The first step is the most obvious. Brand name drug industries exploiting loopholes in the law to block lower-priced generic drugs from even getting into the market, we can stop that. Generic drugs are identical to their brand name counterparts except for price. Generics are typically 70 to 80 percent less expensive than their brand name equivalent.

In some cases the price differential is even greater. The anti-anxiety drug Vasotec sells for $180 per prescription. The generic costs $55, a savings of $125.

Consumers lose millions in potential savings when brand name companies block their competitors from entering the market. As a matter of fact, the Congressional Budget Office estimates consumers would save $60 billion in the next 10 years if Congress would close the legal loopholes that drug companies use to scam the patent system.

Under current law, for instance, FDA suspends generic drug approvals for 2½ years the moment a brand name drug company sues for patent infringement. By attaching new and often unrelated patents to an existing drug right before its original patent expires, brand name companies have been able to repeatedly get a 30-month addition lengthening of their patent.

The drug industry ties up generic drug approvals in the courts by repeatedly challenging the methods the FDA uses to ensure that the generic and the brand product are equivalent. The CBO estimates that consumers will lose $60 billion, as I said, due to these delaying tactics. That is how much consumers will save if Congress and the President do the right thing.

The Federal Trade Commission, the Patent and Trademark Office, and the President have acknowledged the need to address inappropriate delays in access to lower-priced generic products.

The other body passed by an overwhelming margin legislation to close the loopholes and deliver long overdue relief to American consumers. The House of Representatives should pass it, too.

There are three pieces of legislation, each of which would close the loopholes. They are not partisan. They are not radical. And, realistically, they are not a panacea. But any one of them, if passed by this Congress and signed by the President, will force the drug industry to clean up its act, will get generic competition into the marketplace, will save consumers tens of billions of dollars.

I urge Republican leadership, which has stood in the way of this because of their closeness to the drug industry, I urge Republican leadership to give Members the opportunity to debate and vote on one of these bills in time to get a product to the President's desk.

Members of both sides of the aisle recognize that it is time to do something about runaway prescription drug costs. Removing unjustifiable barriers to lower-priced medicines is a logical step. Given the havoc that runaway drug prices are wreaking on this Nation, on all people, but especially on America's seniors, it should be an imperative.

CELEBRATING THE 215th ANNIVERSARY OF THE CONSTITUTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of January 23, 2002, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. PENCE) is recognized during morning hour debates for 5 minutes.

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, it is Constitution Day in America, which may sound boring for some, their eyes may glaze over, but not for me in my house.

It was on this day, Mr. Speaker, 215 years ago that all 12 State delegations approved at the Constitutional Convention what was to become the Constitution of the United States. Think about that, 215 years ago. If we reckon a life is 75 years, Mr. Speaker, it was scarcely 3 lifetimes ago which this awesome document which begins with words that have now rung through generations, through history, to inspire not only the American people, to inspire the world, were crafted and adopted.

Words that begin with "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, to ordain and establish this Constitution."

It would take until June 21 of 1788 that the Constitution would become effective, Mr. Speaker, when ratified by the ninth State, New Hampshire. And then in the Spring of 1789, the government would first convene in the first Congress in Federal Hall in New York City where the 107th Congress, of which I am privileged to be a part, gathered just 10 days ago, the second time only that we have met since those very first days.

Three short lifetimes ago, the Federal convention convened and created a document which John Marshall, the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, appointed by our second President, John Adams, would describe thusly: "A Constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." There have been crises in those three lifetimes, Mr. Speaker.

Think of it. Seventy-five years to the day after this document was ratified, Americans would find themselves locked in the bloodiest battle in American history. September 17, 1862, outside Sharpsburg, Maryland, would be the battle of Antietam on this very day; and there, as much as anything, they were fighting over this document. They were fighting over a vision of a Union that would be preserved.

Seventy-five years from that day it would be September 17, 1937, and war was gathering in Europe, a dictator unchecked expanding his borders, violating international convention, and 75 years would pass and those experiences resonate with our experiences today.

Three short lifetimes ago, our founders bequeathed to us a document that has been the inspiration of the world, written most assuredly, Mr. Speaker, by the hand of man, men with feet of clay, very human in every sense of the word, but as we embrace the realities of these 215 years and how this great Republic, this great representative democracy has inspired the world, we can be certain of this, that while it was written by the hand of men, they were most certainly guided by providence to offer this gift to their posterity and to the entire world.

So I thought it imperative today, Mr. Speaker, that we gather to remember the accomplishment of three short lifetimes ago, the Constitution of the United States of America, and may it be said as equally as it is today when four short lifetimes have passed that we will gather in this same place, that we will celebrate the liberties enshrined in the Constitution and in the Bill of Rights; and may it be our prayer in our lifetimes to pass along this great document and these great traditions as adequately and as ably as our forebears have passed it onto us on this Constitution Day, 2002.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KERNs). Pursuant to the order of the House of January 23, 2002, the gentlewoman from North Carolina (Mrs. CLAYTON) is recognized during morning hour debates for 5 minutes.

Mrs. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, there is a consensus among Members of Congress, in fact, I think there is a consensus among the American people, as well as the President also says, that Medicare beneficiaries should indeed receive prescription assistance. The Congressional Budget Office has projected that the cost of providing prescription drugs to seniors will certainly be high, and it is unpredictable as to how high it will go; but they have said to how the estimate has been made in the last year, that by the year 2010 we will be 23 percent higher than what we predicted it to be, and already it is too high. Already seniors cannot afford that.

This increases the sense of reality that we cannot make long-term predictions nor can we make short-term predictions with accuracy. With that reality, what we know with the combined fact that more baby boomers are retiring among them, are retiring now, more than ever before, they are going to live longer and need more health care; and yet their reliance on Medicaid does not give them any assurance for that.

We must ensure that our seniors have the peace and security that they need to have access to affordable prescription drugs for maintenance of a quality of life.

We must also work to make sure that they do not deplete their savings and what low income they have from their retirement and their Social Security in order to provide prescription drugs. My colleagues have heard that seniors now have to make the awful election, whether they feed themselves or pay the rent or buy prescriptions that they just really need for their health; and some of them are making the decision, which is harmful to their health, of dividing their daily dosage and spreading it so it can go further.

Our seniors deserve better than that. They are the people who have worked to make our country as robust as it is. They have served our Nation in a variety of ways, have served on the military to make sure we are secure. Certainly, it is not because we do not have the technology. It is because we have not found the political will to do this.

In my district, the First Congressional District, our population of seniors continues to increase. Consider this: from 1980 through the eighties and through the nineties, from the ages of 65 to 84 increased by 31 percent. From the 1990s to 2000, there was an additional increase of some 16 percent added to that 31 percent. So we are living longer, those from the ages of 65 to 84, and also, the mean income is approximately $26,800 in my district. That does not allow a lot of flexibility of maintaining a quality of life and increasing the cost for prescription drugs and other health care.

In 1996, the average out-of-pocket costs for prescription drugs for seniors living below the poverty line was $368 for an average cost then; but now in 2000 that same index would be 2,000, $386 from 1996 to 2,000. My colleagues say, well, that is not a lot of money. That is a lot of money when the income has not gone up; and when a person retires their income is going down, not up, and the increase we give for a Social Security benefit certainly does not go into the cost of senior citizens. So we need far more money because seniors indeed are not able to have the income security to protect them. $463 is the equivalent of a mortgage payment that seniors would have to pay. They can no longer afford that.

We need to find ways in which we can help provide for them, and many adults are now having to reach back and provide for their senior parents as they are also providing for their children because their income, the retirement and the Social Security, is not sufficient.

The very least that Congress could do is to work towards bringing a prescription drug benefit that would be part of our Medicare benefit. Most elderly receive their primary health assistance through Medicare, and I would gather today if we were doing Medicare all over again we would make sure there would be a prescription drug provision. Yet Medicare does not provide any coverage for any senior's outpatient prescription drugs. We almost have to go to the hospital to be there and most seniors now have conditions that can be maintained by not doing it.

Mr. Speaker, we have an opportunity, in fact, we have an obligation, Mr. Speaker, to make sure we have a prescription drug program that works for our seniors and not put up these artificial programs that we say that the companies are going to give some rebate. They need something they can rely on. To do less would be unworthy of us as a great Nation.

PAYING FOR PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of January 23, 2002, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. PALLONE) is recognized during morning hour debates for 5 minutes.

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up on my two colleagues. The gentlewoman from North Carolina talked in great detail about why we need a prescription drug benefit for seniors and why it should be under Medicare as an expansion of Medicare, and my colleague from Ohio talked about the cost of prescription drugs and how the brand-name drug companies essentially have put on a program, a lobbying campaign, a very effective one to try to prevent any kind of changes in the law that would allow for generic drugs or other kinds of measures that would reduce costs, not only for seniors but for all Americans; and I think those two discussions by my colleagues really are at the heart of the issue.

When it comes to prescription drugs, we need a benefit program under Medicare for senior citizens and those eligible for Medicare; and at the same time, we need to address the issue of costs and bring down costs for all Americans because increasingly more and more people cannot afford to pay for prescription drugs and go without. And I also add, the real problem here is the brand-name drug companies. They are artificially keeping the price of prescription drugs high in order to make even more profit than they would normally make.

Let me say, the Democrats in the House of Representatives, my colleagues on the Democratic side, have proposed an answer to both of these problems, both to the benefit and to the costs. At the time when the Republicans and the Republican leadership were trying to move a prescription drug bill that would simply privatize the program and say, well, we will give people some money, senior citizens, and maybe they can go out and buy a prescription drug policy in the private sector.

The Democrats were saying that would not work, and we came up with a prescription drug program under Medicare. We basically said that just like under Medicare now, they can pay so much per month in a premium to get their doctor bills paid. Most seniors pay a premium, so much per month under what is called part B of Medicare; and after the first $100 deductible, 80 percent of the costs of their doctor bills are paid for by the Federal Government. We propose, as Democrats, doing the same thing with prescription drugs. A senior would pay about a $25 per-month premium. They would have a $100 deductible for the first $100 in drugs; and after that, 80 percent of the costs would be paid for by the Federal Government for all the prescription drug needs up to $2,500 a year, at which time everything would be paid for at 100 percent by the Federal Government.

What we did in our Medicare benefit program in our proposal, by contrast to the Republicans, is we said the Secretary of Health and Human Services would be mandated to negotiate lower prices for all the seniors that were in the Medicare program, about 30 to 40 million seniors. Following up on what the Federal Government does with the Veterans Administration or with the military, we said the Secretary of Health and Human Services would be mandated to bring down costs for prescription drugs in the Medicare program because he would have the power to negotiate. We estimate that would bring down the cost of prescription drugs maybe 30, 40 percent over what they are now.

The Republicans totally rejected the idea of expanding Medicare to include prescription drugs. They just want people to go out and buy their own private health insurance, and they put in their bill which passed the House of Representatives that the head of the Medicare program or the head of the prescription drug program that they were proposing would not have any authority to negotiate price reductions, in fact, would be forbidden from doing so.

Why are they doing this? They are doing this because they do not want anything to negatively impact the drug companies. What the drug companies have been doing in this House of Representatives is very clear. From the very beginning they were giving huge amounts of money to the Republicans. They had a big fund raiser for them one night a couple of months ago when we were actually having these bills in committee being marked up, when they wrote the bill, the Republican bill, to make sure it was not an expansion of Medicare and did not impact costs in any way for drugs; and then they started putting up ads on TV where they promoted the Republican candidates for Congress or the Republican incumbents who voted for their own drug bill and said that people should vote for them because they are doing a very good job and providing people with a prescription drug benefit, which is simply not true.

We heard that this year United Seniors, which is basically a front for PHARMA, for the prescription name drug industry has pumped another 10, or I do not know how many, millions of dollars into an ad campaign. The bottom line is that the drug companies are going to do whatever they can with their Republican allies in Congress to make sure the issue of price is not addressed.

What are the Democrats saying about price? We heard my colleague from Ohio. He has introduced a bill similar to what passed the Senate that basically tries to encourage generic drugs by eliminating some of the barriers that the name-brand drug companies have put in place that make it more difficult under the patent system for generic drugs to come to market.

□ 1300

Mr. Speaker, we can address this in so many ways, but we have to get to the cost issue; otherwise we are not going to get to the problem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This concludes the call of the Private Calendar.

THE NIH SECURITY ACT

(Mrs. MORELLA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the critically important National Institutes of Health Security Act.

After September 11, Congress authorized a 322-acre biomedical research facility to bolster its security by doubling its police ranks from 64 officers to 108. This decision was made by U.S. intelligence experts who determined that the NIH campus is vulnerable and a potential target for terrorist attack, infiltration or theft of protected materials and research. Unfortunately, the force has never come close to reaching those numbers due to the current pay and retirement system.

NIH police are one of the lowest paid in the Washington metropolitan area. Making matters worse, NIH police are not classified as Federal "law enforcement officers," and are thereby denied the superior retirement benefits that distinction affords. The result is in low retention of officers, difficulty with recruitment. Without retirements included, there exists a 77 percent attrition rate at NIH yearly.

Due to the severity of the situation and the resources that NIH protects, I am introducing legislation that would allow NIH to bolster its security force. This bill would add no additional cost to the Federal Government. It would simply allow some long overdue flexibility to be used by NIH.

Without these changes, we are undoubtedly allowing a prime target to remain vulnerable to terrorists.

I want to recognize NIH law enforcement personnel, specifically Clyde Bartz and the Fraternal Order of Police, for raising my awareness of this issue.

HONORING ENLACE AND GUILLERMINA GARCIA FOR THEIR CONTRIBUTIONS TO EDUCATION

(Ms. SANCHEZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. SANCHEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the parents and volunteers who participated in the first Annual Walk for Success, sponsored by ENLACE, to raise the awareness of the importance of registering for school.

I would especially like to honor one mother in particular, Guillermina Garcia, for her dedication to her family and to the community. Like many Americans, Guillermina dreams of sending her children to college, and she wants her friends and neighbors to aspire to this lofty goal also.

Despite the many hardships that she faces, Mrs. Garcia finds the time to walk throughout her community door to door and to talk with parents about becoming more involved in their children's education.

Mrs. Garcia also finds time to attend a weekly math class which teaches her how to play games with her children to help them with math. Through her actions she has proven herself to be a role model for her children and for our community.

I would like to congratulate Mrs. Guillermina Garcia and the ENLACE organization for working to educate Orange County residents about educational opportunities.

PASS H.R. 5272 TO LOWER DRUG PRICES

(Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, according to industry experts, health insurance premiums will jump 13 to 24 percent next year. What is driving this increase? Mostly the cost of prescription drugs.

To deflect attention from these remarkably high prices, the drug industry argues that prescription medicines actually save money by reducing health care costs. If they were more reasonably priced, that might be true. There is no doubt that medicine helps alleviate the need for other health care services. But prescription drugs are priced so outrageously high that their inflationary impact far outstrips any savings. Skyrocket insurance premiums simply do not lie.

There is no excuse for the drug industry's pricing practices. There is no excuse for the tactics drug makers use to block lower-priced generic drugs from the market. There is no excuse for the drug makers' lobbying tactics to try to kill our legislation.

This body must act on H.R. 5272, legislation that will stop the gaming and deliver lower drug prices to the American people, an estimated $60 billion in savings.

I urge House Republican leadership, all too often too close to the drug industry, to bring this consumer savings bill up for a vote before Columbus Day.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

SEC. 7. NO NEW REGULATORY AUTHORITY.

Nothing in this Act and the amendments made by this Act may be construed as establishing regulatory authority or modifying any existing regulatory authority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS) and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on H.R. 1784.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today the House will consider H.R. 1784, the Women's Health Office Act of 2002. I would like to take a moment to sincerely thank our colleague, the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. MORELLA), for her tireless, tireless support of this bill, which ensures that our key public health agencies continue working together, and that is greatly to be emphasized, continue working together, to address the unique health needs of women.

President George H.W. Bush created the Office of Women's Health at the Department of Health and Human Services to improve the health of American women by advancing and coordinating a comprehensive women's health agenda throughout the department.

The Office of Women's Health, OWH, is the government's champion and focal point for women's health issues, and works to address inequities in research, health care services and education. Furthermore, the Office of Women's Health encourages women to take personal responsibility for their own health and wellness. H.R. 1784 provides statutory authority for this office.

This legislation, Mr. Speaker, also authorizes four additional offices of women's health at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, at the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, at the Health Resources and Services Administration, and at the Food and Drug Administration. A coordinating committee will be created within each of these offices to identify the need for programs, activities and research that focus on women's health.

Congress can and should play an active role in promoting women's health research and prevention measures. This measure will create an infrastructure within HHS that will help the department better focus its energies on women's health, and I urge all Members to join me in supporting passage of this important legislation. H.R. 1784 will improve the health of all women.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I begin by thanking my friend, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS), for his support and interest in this legislation. I am pleased we are considering the Women's Health Office Act passed out of our subcommittee and then passed the full committee also. I applaud the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. MORELLA) and the gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. MALONEY) for their involvement in this issue.

Certain diseases and conditions, as we know, as we finally address, exclusively affect women, are more prevalent in women, or affect women differently. While research in women's health has traditionally been far too limited, development of a number of women's health offices in the past few years has begun to shrink that disparity.

The Women's Health Office Act would statutorily create offices of women's health in the Department of Health and Human Services, the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality, Health Resource and Services Administration, the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, and the Food and Drug Administration. These offices have committed themselves to promoting women's health. This bill will help ensure that the needs and gaps in research, policy programs, education, and training in women's health will continue to be addressed in a concerted way. I recommend, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues support it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she might consume to the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. MORELLA), who is the author of this legislation and who did not just sit back, but kept pushing and pushing every time certainly she saw me in the hallways or here in this Chamber.

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, as the lead sponsor of this bill, H.R. 1784, the Women's Health Office Act of 2002, I must say I am delighted to be here today. I am here today with this bill with great thanks to the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS), and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN), the ranking member. Also, I would like to thank the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. TAUZIN), and the ranking member, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL).

But it is true what the gentleman from Florida has said: I have bugged him indefatigably, and I very much appreciate this important piece of legislation coming before us. I also want to thank the 96 cosponsors and the gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. MALONEY) for joining with me on this legislation. I also wanted to thank all of the hard-working organizations, the nonprofits and individuals, for their unity in working together to advance women's health and to help to bring this bill to the House floor for a vote.

Mr. Speaker, the Women's Health Office Act of 2002 will provide for permanent authorization for offices of women's health in four Federal agencies: the Department of Health and Human Services, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the Health Resources and Services Administration, and the Food and Drug Administration.

In the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality, the bill requires the director of the agency to designate an official of the Office of Priority Populations to report to the director on activities regarding women's health.

As many of my colleagues probably know, for years our Nation's medical research community actually ignored the health concerns of women. For example, in 1989, the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues asked the General Accounting Office to investigate the National Institutes of Health, their policy regarding the inclusion of women in clinical trials and protocols. Back then, women were routinely excluded from critically important studies on heart disease, cancer, HIV and AIDS; and it was found that diseases primarily affecting women were severely underfunded.

In its report, the GAO found that NIH had made little progress in implementing a policy that encourages the inclusion of women in research populations. So the women's caucus then introduced the Women's Health Equity Act which, among its provisions, called for the establishment of an Office of Women's Health at NIH and a requirement that women and minorities be included whenever appropriate in research studies funded by NIH.

That fall, on the very day that Senator MIKULSKI, then Congresswoman Pat Schroeder, and I went to NIH to discuss these inequities, NIH announced that it had created an Office of Research of Women's Health. This office would ensure that greater resources were devoted to diseases primarily affecting women and ensure that women would be included in clinical trials. We in Congress subsequently codified that, and the office was signed into law by President Bush the First.

Since then, funding for breast and ovarian cancer at NCI, which is the National Cancer Institute, has more than quadrupled, and funding for osteoporosis has grown from only two osteoporosis-specific grants in the entire country in the early 1980s to more than $80 million in osteoporosis-specific grants today. Despite great strides on women's health research, we still have to be vigilant and we still must address issues that are not receiving the public attention and the research priority that they deserve.

For example, we do not understand why an estimated 75 percent of autoimmune diseases occur in women, most frequently during the child-bearing years. Hormones are thought to play a role, because some autoimmune illnesses occur more frequently after menopause; others suddenly improve during pregnancy with flare-ups occurring after delivery, while still others will get worse during pregnancy. We do not understand why more than 90 percent of those with eating disorders are women. Further, the number of American women affected by these illnesses has doubled to at least 5 million in the past 3 decades. In fact, we do not even understand why more girls are affected by autism than boys. This list continues with heart and stroke, cancer, and many more diseases.

Mr. Speaker, another area of women's health where I would like to see more efforts is this area of microbicides. Microbicides are a potential new class of products that women can use to prevent HIV infection as well as other sexually transmitted diseases. Today, the United States has the highest incidence of sexually transmitted diseases in the industrialized world. Mr. Speaker, 15.4 million Americans acquired an STD in 1999 alone. STDs cause serious, costly, even deadly, conditions for women and their children, including infertility, pregnancy complications, cervical cancer, infant mortality, and a higher risk of contracting HIV. Microbicides have the potential to save billions in health care costs. The total cost to the U.S. economy of STDs, excluding HIV infection, was approximately $8.4 billion in 1999 alone. When the cost of sexually transmitted HIV infection is included, that total rises to $20 billion.

Microbicide research and development receives less than 2 percent of the Federal AIDS research budget, and best estimates show that less than half of this amount is dedicated directly to product development. Clearly, this is not nearly enough to keep pace with the growing STD and HIV epidemics.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that, with passage of this bill, it will bring us closer to the day when women will no longer have to fear getting HIV and STDs.

Well, H.R. 1783 is a simple, clean bill. All it does is it provides statutory authority for offices that are already in place. These offices and programs have a very good track record. For example, heart disease is the number one killer of American women. AHRQ has funded studies to develop tools to improve diagnostic accuracy in emergency rooms and dramatically increase the timely use of clot-busting drugs in women.

AHRQ is also working to reduce the impact of breast cancer, another disease which takes a heavy toll on women. The agency is currently conducting outreach to poor and minority women who are less likely to get mammograms to ensure that they receive this critical preventive health care.

Providing statutory authorization for Federal women's health offices, as we do today, is a critical step in ensuring that women's health research continues to receive the attention that it requires in this 21st century.

So concluding, Mr. Speaker, I can say without exaggeration that women working together as patients, lawyers, advocates, medical researchers, and Members of Congress have been a powerful catalyst for the advances that we have made in the research and treatment of breast, ovarian, cervical cancer, osteoporosis and heart disease. The men have been there for us, bringing forward this bill and others that do help with the focus on health for women, as well as men and all.

So I urge my colleagues to support this legislation and programs to address the health needs of all of our citizens and the fundamental challenges posed by our Nation's health care system.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from the District of Columbia (Ms. NORTON).

Ms. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time, and I appreciate the work of the distinguished chairman and the distinguished ranking member and the bipartisan effort that has brought this bill to the floor.

I rise in strong support of the Women's Health Office Act. Anyone trying to keep track of women's health issues today is literally on a merry-go-round. The best recent example is the hormone replacement treatment quagmire, HRT. Here we had a major drug, progesterone, where a study has just shown serious health consequences for a drug that was being administered to millions of women to promote serious health benefits. I mean, that is just how complicated it is. But that is the nature of the women's health beast. And we do not need to make it more complicated than it already is. Having multiple offices that do not relate one to another with no statutory imprimatur makes it more complicated than it really is.

Speaking of complications, what I think these offices help us to do is to face the fact that females are a particularly complicated organism. Throughout her life, a woman emerges as diametrically opposed to what she once was. A woman of child-bearing age is the opposite of the menopausal woman she shall become.

Now, I have not even got to the differences between women and men. If we are dealing with these kinds of complications in a single human being, we have to figure out ways to make sure that what happens to her health is as good as it gets, or as good as we can get it.

Because of such complications, the bipartisan women's caucus successfully fought, for example, to have medical and scientific studies that included women and not only men, because not including women had terrible consequences for us. That is one of the reasons that the average American woman today does not know that heart disease is the number one killer of women, because these studies, this information, has not been out there, because we have not paid the kind of close and coordinated attention to women's health that this bill will help to promote. It has been very important to test women differently from men when putting drugs on the market, because let us face it, women have very different chemistry.

Mr. Speaker, a year ago I signed on to a bipartisan letter asking HHS Secretary Tommy Thompson to help authorize the multiple women's offices, only one of which was statutorily authorized. The best way to do it is the permanent authorization embodied in this bill, and I strongly support it; and I ask for the support of Members of this House.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, but I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Houston, Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE).

Ms. JACKSON-LEE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished ranking member; and I thank the distinguished chairman for being a leader on these issues. The chemistry between the ranking member and the chairman has presented a lot of good initiatives on this floor; and I thank them for that, because health care is American. It involves all of us. I thank the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. MORELLA), and of course my colleague, the gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. MALONEY); and I announce as well that I was very pleased to be one of the original cosponsors of this legislation.

It is important to delineate what this legislation actually does. It codifies and provides statutory authority for a women's health center in four very vital health agencies of this government, and that is, of course, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the Health Resources and Services Administration, the Food and Drug Administration, and the Office of Priority Populations within the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality, the lead agency for women's research.

□ 1430

But the Centers for Disease Control certainly is the key as it relates to the fighting of diseases here in the United States.

I think something else is important, as well, as we look at this legislation, that all of these agencies will be brought to bear on the complexity of women's health and will be required to identify projects in women's health that should be conducted by the particular centers.

In addition, they will be brought to bear to consult with health professionals, nongovernmental organizations, consumer organizations, women's health professionals, and other individuals and groups as appropriate on the policy of the centers' work as it is regarding women.

I heard my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN), mention just a few moments ago or sometime before on the need for a guaranteed drug benefit under Medicare. I see my seniors, in particular women, as I visit with them in my district needing to have this kind of legislation.

This legislation that we are debating on the floor of the House will go a long way in helping the health of women of all ages, including those in puberty and young women of child-bearing age, now that we find that women can have children a longer period of time; and minority women in particular, who we find have the highest percentage of infections of HIV/AIDS in the United States of America.

A lot of this research, as well, can help our friends around the world, particularly developing nations, where we use now more women in clinical testing; and we can get more of the data that can be utilized by our friends around the world, particularly in our work with the United Nations.

So this is a historic occasion to begin to understand that the study of women's health should be focused. We should get one science, one consistent science, so that when there are prescriptions on certain hormone treatment, that we can have the research and the science to make sure that what we are suggesting or treating women with is the right direction to go. I applaud this legislation.

In conclusion, let me say that I have filed legislation dealing with cultural competence. It relates to this issue, and I look forward to working with the committees on this issue.

I rise in support of H.R. 1784, the Women's Health Office Act of 2002.

In the last century, the life expectancy of American women has increased by 30 years. Now we face the challenge of keeping women alive and healthy. American in the new millennium faces increasingly complex public health challenges. I stand here today, ashamed to say that thus far our nation has not taken advantage of the opportunities and advancements in medical technology to meet the goal of improved health for all Americans.

The Women's Health Office Act of 2002 amends the Public Health Services Act to establish within the Office of the Secretary of Health and Human Services an office on Women's Health, headed by a Deputy Assistant Secretary for Women's Health. In addition, the Women's Health Act requires the establishment of a Department of Health and Human Services Coordinating Committee, a National Women's Health Information Center, and requires biennial reports to Congress.

Research has established that the existence of persistent racial and socioeconomic disparities in women's health in the United States. We know that coronary disease is the leading cause of death for both men and women. But, nearly twice as many women in the U.S. die of heart disease and stroke every year as die from all types of cancer. Yet, multiple studies have shown that women are less likely than men to be referred for invasive cardiac procedures.

While the life expectancy of women in the United States has risen, as a group, African American women have a shorter life expectancy and experience earlier onset of such chronic conditions such as diabetes and hypertension. If we look at the death rates for diseases of the heart, African American women are clearly at risk with 147 deaths per 100,000. When we look at cervical cancer, we see that the incidence rate of invasive cervical cancer is higher among Asian-American women. Yet, we cannot explain the causes of these higher rates.

Disparities are perhaps most alarming when we look at HIV/AIDS. Twenty-two percent of Americans currently living with HIV are women, and 77 percent of those are African American or Hispanic. Many people are shocked to know that AIDS is the second leading cause of death among African American women age 25 to 44.

There are nearly 40 million women in America who are members of racial and ethnic minority groups. These women suffer disproportionately from premature death, disease, and disabilities. Many also face tremendous barriers to optimal health. This is a growing challenge in our nation.

The challenge is even greater when we consider the aging population. By the year 2050, nearly 1 in 4 adult women will be 65 years old or older, and an astonishing 1 in 17 will be 85 years old or older. We must ensure that our Federal agencies are in the forefront working to find solutions to the challenges our nation faces in caring for the health of our women.

The "Women's Health Office Act of 2002" provides permanent authorization for offices of women's health in five federal agencies: the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS); the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC); the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality (AHRQ); the Health Resources and Services Administration; and the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

Mr. Speaker, behind each impersonal statistic is a woman whose life is potentially at risk because of health disparities and a family that will be devastated by the loss of a mother or sister. The Women's Health Act of 2002 would be a tremendous step toward eliminating health disparities. In the last century we made improvements that expanded the lifespan of women. In this century we have the challenge of meeting the health care needs and improving the quality of life for all women.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I, too, thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN) for his cooperation, Mr. Speaker. Yes, even though we disagree on matters of philosophy, we do have a chemistry that works well for the legislation that is up before this House.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume, just to say that I feel the same way, to be sure.

Mrs. CHRISTENSEN. Mr. Speaker, in good conscience, I rise in support of H.R. 1784. The Women's Health Office Act of 2002 amends the Public Health Service Act to establish within the Office of the Secretary of Health and Human Services (HHS) an Office on Women's Health, headed by a Deputy Assistant Secretary for Women's Health, requires the establishment of a Department of Health and Human Services Coordinating Committee and a National Women's Health Information Center, requires biennial reports to Congress and authorizes appropriations for FY 2003 through 2007.

Women make up the largest number of Americans afflicted by so many of today's leading illness—many of which are preventable if steps are taken earlier in life through routine care and a balanced and healthy lifestyle.

Heart disease is the number one killer of American women. Although the incidence of HIV/AIDS is decreasing in white males, it has become the third leading cause of death among women ages 25 to 44 and the leading cause of death among African American women in this age group. Even more alarming is the younger ages at which infection is occurring.

As we carry out our myriad responsibilities, we have too often forsaken not only our physical health, but our mental health as well. We make up 12 percent of the U.S. population suffering from mental illness. Nearly 4.1 million women in this country currently use illicit drugs, and over 1.2 million misuse prescription drugs for nonmedical reasons.

Currently, minority women receive fewer preventive health interventions than white women. 55 percent of Asian American women, 43 percent of Hispanic women and 37 percent of African American women did not have a Pap test within the past year.

54 percent of Asian American women, 52 percent of African American women, and 51 percent of Hispanic women did not have a mammogram within the past two years. 74 percent of Hispanic women and 73 percent of Asian American women did not have a blood pressure screening within the past year; and stroke occurs at a higher rate among African American and Hispanic women compared with white women.

We in the Congressional Black Caucus, who work to close the gaps in health care and raise the health status for African Americans and People of Color, are committed to improving the health of women and all Americans.

Mr. Speaker, this bill directs the Secretary of HHS to establish within the Office of the Director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention the Office of Women's Health, headed by a Director, requires the director to establish the Coordinating Committee on Research on Women's Health and requires biennial reports to Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in efforts to eliminate health disparities I am proud to support my colleague on the other side of the aisle in this campaign to give all women health information and to guide them in making the choices which will enable them to embark on a path to good health.

Mr. BLUMENAUER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House is debating and voting today on H.R. 1784, the Women's Health Office Act, a bill that I support and have cosponsored. This measure will provide the tools necessary for successful coordination of women's health efforts in the federal government. Passage of this bill will bring needed attention and coordination to federal efforts to prevent, treat and research women's health needs.

Streamlined federal communication regarding women's health issues is vital. This bill will also prevent attempts, like those made last year, to eliminate the offices of women's health throughout federal health agencies. Specific statutory authorization, as provided under this bill, will allow the women's health offices to carry out their tasks without fear that their programs or funding will be cut.

It is essential that we provide stable funding and statutory support for the good work these programs do to promote women's health, study diseases that affect women and promote the inclusion of women in research studies. I urge the speedy adoption of this important measure.

Ms. SCHAKOWSKY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 1784, the Women's Health Office Act. By establishing Offices of Women's Health throughout different agencies in the Department of Health and Human Services, this legislation recognizes the ongoing need to focus attention on various health issues particularly related to women. Women make up over half the adult population of this country and it is critical that we make women's health a top priority.

For years, almost all medical research was conducted from a male perspective, while women's medical needs were ignored. Today there is a need for more research on breast, cervical, and ovarian cancer, hormone replacement therapy, and how various ailments such as osteoporosis and heart disease specifically affect women. It is important that we conduct this research, not as an afterthought, but as primary research important to everyone's well-being.

There is also a need to ensure that all women in the U.S. have access to health care coverage, including comprehensive reproductive health care, prenatal care, preventative care, and coverage throughout menopause and old age. Too many poor and low-income women in this country have little or no access to health care. This is particularly harmful and unacceptable for pregnant women and women suffering from ongoing ailments.

I also expect the new Offices of Women's Health within the various agencies to focus on domestic violence and sexual assault as serious threats to both women's health and public health in general. Violence against women is the leading cause of injury to women in America between the ages of 15 and 54. Not only does this violence leave victims with visible injuries, but it can lead to other physical problems and emotional distress. It is critical that we look at violence against women from a medical perspective, as well as examine its social consequences, in order to recognize it, address it, and work to end it.

I am pleased that the House of Representatives is addressing the issue of women's health today and I urge my colleagues to vote for H.R. 1784, the Women's Health Office Act.

Ms. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 1784, the Women's Health Office Act.

As an original cosponsor and vocal advocate of this legislation, I am delighted that it is finally being considered by the House. Congress has delayed far too long in addressing the second-class status of the various offices of women's health throughout the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS).

As other speakers have attested, only two of the HHS offices of women's health are currently established in statute: the Office of Research on Women's Health at the National Institutes of Health, and the women's health associate administrator at the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. While offices of women's health exist at a number of other agencies, they can be moved, altered, or eliminated at the discretion of the agency director. This lack of permanence is extremely detrimental to long-term planning and multi-year efforts. It also sends a message to our nation's women that we are not firmly committed to improving their health.

Women's health is not a passing fancy or a fad that will go out of fashion. It is a serious discipline that will require the attention of doctors, scientists, and health care providers far into the future. The offices of women's health should not be an afterthought. H.R. 1784 is a vital step in permanently integrating women's health into the structure of our health care system. I look forward to voting for this important initiative, and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. WU. Mr. Speaker, for too long, women's health needs have been ignored or excluded in federal medical research. For instance, one federally funded study examined the ability of aspirin to prevent heart attacks in 20,000 medical doctors, all of whom were men, despite the fact that heart disease is a leading cause of death among women. Another study on breast cancer examined hundreds of men.

Fortunately, this attitude has changed. Today, medical researchers and health care providers know and understand the importance of distinguishing women's health. I strongly support these efforts, but I realize that more needs to be done. Last May, the GAO released a report on the status of women's research at NIH. Although noting that much progress has been made, the report stated that the Institute had made less progress in implementing the requirement that certain clinical trials be designed and carried out to permit valid analysis by sex, which could reveal whether interventions affect women and men differently. It also found that NIH researchers, even though they would include women in their trials, would either do no analysis on the basis of sex, or would not publish the sex-based results if no difference was found.

This must change. We need to continue to eliminate this health care gender gap and improve women's access to affordable, quality health services. The bill before us today, by Women's Health Office Act, will bring us one step closer to eliminating this gap by providing permanent authorization for Offices of Women's Health in five Federal agencies: the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS); the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC); the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality (AHRQ); the Health Resources and Services Administration (HRSA); and the Food and Drug Administration (FDA). Currently, only two women's health offices in the Federal Government have statutory authorization: the Office of Research on Women's Health at the National Institutes of Health, and the Office for Women's Services within the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA).

Offices of Women's Health across the Public Health Service are charged with coordinating women's health activities and monitoring progress on women's health issues within their respective agencies, and they have been successful in making Federal programs and policies more responsive to women's health issues. Unfortunately, all of the good work these offices are doing is not guaranteed in Public Health Service authorizing law. Providing statutory authorization for federal women's health offices is a critical step in ensuring that women's health research will continue to receive the attention it requires in future years.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this important legislation.

Mrs. MALONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak on the floor in favor of H.R. 1784, The Women's Health Office Act. Congresswoman MORELLA and I have worked on this bill for a number of years and I want to thank the Congresswoman for her leadership on this issue.

In addition, I want to thank the Energy & Commerce committee, Chairman TAUZIN, Congressman DINGELL, Chairman BILIRAKIS, and Congressman SHERROD BROWN for moving this bill forward and for their dedication to women's health.

The other body has also taken action on this issue. I am pleased to see that this legislation was included in the Senate's "Women's Health Act," S. 2328, that passed out of the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions earlier this month.

By permanently establishing offices for women's health within the Department of Health and Human Services, the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality, the Health Resources and Services Administration, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and the Food and Drug Administration, the Women's Health Office Act will provide the much needed statutory authority to further develop women's health research.

H.R. 1784 is endorsed by 50 advocacy organizations who represent women, health care professionals and consumers, including the Society for Women's Health Research, the Women's Research and Education Institute, and the YWCA of the U.S.A.

H.R. 1784 is grounded in a basic premise: only through good science and research do we find better treatments and cures. Women and girls should benefit equitably in the advances made in health care and medical research.

Women around the United States need and deserve to have their health protected and not overlooked. Yet, various health differences between men and women have long gone unnoticed and not studied. Just last spring, the GAO reported that 8 out of 10 drugs pulled off the market were more harmful to women than to men. These were drugs that underwent extensive clinical trials and were approved by the FDA. Yet, once on the market these drugs caused serious health hazards for the women they were prescribed to.

Obviously, there is still much work to be done in the area of women's health. Congress, Federal health agencies, and the scientific community are working to ensure that women's health is made a priority. This legislation is another important step towards equity in health.

I support this legislation. Women need this legislation. Let's work to improve the lives and health of women in this country. Support H.R. 1784, The Women's Health Office Act.

I'm honored to be the lead Democrat on this bill.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support for this bill. The General Accounting Office released a report in 1990 that exposed the historical pattern of neglect of women in health research. As a result of this report, there was a significant increase in government initiatives in women's health research and the creation of women's health offices, advisors, and coordinators in many governmental institutions.

But that was just a beginning. We must now work to ensure that these highly beneficial institutions remain funded and operational into the future.

Currently, there are only two agencies which have federally authorized women's health offices: the Office of Research on Women's Health in the National Institutes of Health, and the Office for Women's Services in the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. Since these two agencies are the only women's health offices established under statute, these are the only two women's health offices that are federally authorized and protected by law. The women's health offices, advisors, and coordinators of other government agencies face the possibility that future administrations will not continue to support them, or that future funding will be insufficient to meet their needs.

H.R. 1784 would provide permanent authorization for women's health offices in the Department of Health and Human Services, the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality, the Health Resource and Service Administration, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and the Food and Drug Administration. It will ensure that these women's health offices will continue under statute and carry on the important work to improve the health of women through ongoing evaluation in the areas of education, prevention, treatment, research, and delivery of services.

I want to note the outstanding leadership on this legislation of my friend and colleague, Representative CAROLYN MALONEY. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this important and beneficial piece of legislation.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOOZMAN). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 1784, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CANDACE NEWMAKER RESOLUTION OF 2002

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 435) expressing the sense of the Congress that the therapeutic technique known as rebirthing is a dangerous and harmful practice and should be prohibited.

H. CON. RES. 435

Whereas "rebirthing" is a form of "attachment therapy", which is used to try to forge new bonds between adoptive parents and their adopted children;

Whereas Candace Newmaker, a child from North Carolina, died from the rebirthing technique, and four other children have died from other forms of attachment therapy;

Whereas the American Psychological Association does not recognize rebirthing as proper treatment; and

Whereas many States have enacted or are considering legislation to prohibit this technique: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring),

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This concurrent resolution may be cited as the "Candace Newmaker Resolution of 2002".

SEC. 2. SENSE OF CONGRESS REGARDING THERAPEUTIC TECHNIQUE KNOWN AS REBIRTHING.

(a) IN GENERAL.—It is the sense of the Congress that the therapeutic technique known as rebirthing is dangerous and harmful, and the Congress encourages each State to enact a law that prohibits such technique.

(b) DEFINITION.—In this resolution, the term "rebirthing" means a therapy to reenact the birthing process in a manner that includes restraint and creates a situation in which a patient may suffer physical injury or death.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS) and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on this legislation, and to include extraneous material.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 435, which does express the sense of the Congress that the therapeutic technique known as rebirthing is a dangerous and harmful practice that should be prohibited.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a terrible story: in Colorado, a 10-year-old girl named Candace Newmaker died during a rebirthing session. Rebirthing is supposed to forge new bonds between adoptive parents and their children, and it involves wrapping the child in a sheet and covering him or her with pillows, often for more than an hour, to simulate the birthing process.

During the procedure, Candace, who had been diagnosed with attachment disorder, told her therapist several times that she could not breathe. However, her therapist did not unwrap her, but told her to push harder to get out. Candace was rushed to a local hospital where she died the next day.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, Candace is not the only child to die and suffer from this practice. Four other children have died as a result of rebirthing therapy.

The American Psychological Association does not recognize rebirthing as proper treatment for attachment disorders, and many States, including Colorado, have enacted legislation which makes it illegal to practice rebirthing therapy if restraints are involved or there is a risk of physical injury. Many other States have enacted or are considering legislation to prohibit this technique, as well.

The Committee on Energy and Commerce unanimously approved the resolution before us on September 5; and we are very, very grateful to the gentlewoman from North Carolina (Mrs. MYRICK) for introducing this resolution. It does encourage each State to enact a law that prohibits this potentially very deadly practice.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this important resolution, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlewoman from North Carolina (Mrs. MYRICK) has introduced legislation inspired by the tragic death of the 10-year-old that the gentleman from Florida (Chairman Bilirakis) referred to as a result of what is commonly known as rebirthing therapy. This resolution expresses congressional opposition to this dangerous and deadly practice.

This radical therapy has been used by some therapists to treat attachment disorder, most commonly seen in adopted children. The American Psychological Association and the National Council for Adoption and other organizations condemn this practice as fraudulent and as dangerous. In addition to the risk of death by asphyxiation, psychologists say it can further damage already-troubled children.

Our committee, the Committee on Energy and Commerce, supported this important resolution. I urge my colleagues to do the same today.

Mr. Speaker, this body brings a variety of resolutions to the floor coming out of the Subcommittee on Health, almost all of which I support, almost all of which are positive.

I wish, however, Mr. Speaker, that we would do a little bit more in terms of trying to rein in prescription drug prices. I look at legislation like this, which is important; but we should be using this time on the floor also to pass legislation like that which the gentlewoman from Missouri (Mrs. EMERSON), a Republican, and I, a Democrat, have introduced, which is the GAAP bill, H.R. 1862.

I have introduced similar legislation with the gentleman from California, H.R. 5272, to deal with the problem of drug pricing. It is a bill the other body has passed. It would stop the gaming of the patent system by the drug companies whereby they have been able to extend their patents by cutting deals with generics, by in some cases using private lawsuits, using the court system.

Our legislation would save $60 million to consumers over the next 10 years. It is something that our committee should do and that this body should do.

While the chairman, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS), has always been so helpful in bipartisanly working on a lot of these issues, the Republican leadership has not been so helpful. I would hope that as we work on these resolutions, as on the resolution of the gentlewoman from North Carolina (Mrs. MYRICK), which I support, House Concurrent Resolution 435, that we would also work on legislation like H.R. 5272, which has bipartisan sponsors, but on which, because of the opposition of the drug industry, Republican leadership, who are much too close to the drug industry, much too aligned to the drug industry with drug industry contributions and political support, has failed to step forward.

I would hope as we pass this bill today that perhaps tomorrow we can work on such legislation, on which we are going to do a discharge petition, I would add parenthetically, this week, Mr. Speaker, and pass legislation to stop the gaming of the patent system, as we pass legislation like we are today.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, to stay on the point of the legislation before us now, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from North Carolina (Mrs. MYRICK), the author of the legislation.

Mrs. MYRICK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time and for bringing this bill forward today.

I do come in support of H. Con. Res. 435, the Candace Newmaker Resolution of 2002. I introduced this resolution in July to honor a little girl from North Carolina who lost her life tragically because of voodoo science called rebirthing. She was a beautiful 10-year-old girl, her whole life ahead of her; and she died tragically in April of 2000 because she was forced to take part in a rebirthing therapy session. Candace had been adopted out of the foster care system by a single woman; and like any child would, she missed her parents and her siblings, and her adoptive mother claimed that she and Candace were not "bonding" properly.

While searching the Internet for help, Candace's adoptive mother discovered "reactive attachment therapy." It is a disorder treatment, a clinical term for what folks see as a child's ability to bond with new adoptive parents.

A therapist, who never even met Candace, diagnosed her with this disorder; and her mother took her to Colorado for treatment. A radical attachment-disorder therapist was paid $7,000 for a 2-week course of treatment for Candace. This was not a licensed psychiatrist or a licensed psychologist. The supposed therapist's highest degree was a master's in social work.

After a few days of other attachment therapy, the therapist thought that Candace was ready for the rebirthing therapy. This was supposed to simulate Candace's trip through the birth canal and would symbolically deliver her to her adoptive mother and erase her natural birth 10 years ago.

The therapist and her assistant, along with two other helpers, wrapped Candace tightly in a flannel blanket and covered her with eight cushions.

Then the four adults put their combined weight of 673 pounds on Candace's 70-pound body, bounced on her and squeezed her to simulate contractions. During the 70-minute procedure, the adults taunted Candace to try to fight her way out of the cocoon. Ten minutes into the procedure, Candace begged to be let out because she could not breathe. Her sobs and her pleas were ignored, and she was even told to go ahead and die by the therapist. Candace continued to cry for her life for 30 more minutes.

Forty minutes into the procedure, she spoke her last word, "no." The adults continued to sit on her and taunt her for 30 more minutes. When they finally unwrapped Candace, she was dead. Her adoptive mother had witnessed the entire episode, and the therapist had even videotaped the procedure which was used against her in a court of law. She and her assistant were convicted of reckless child abuse resulting in death and were sentenced to 16 years each.

Colorado has since passed a law to outlaw this horrendous practice; and other States, including my State of North Carolina, will hopefully do so soon. The resolution I introduced, H. Con. Res. 435, would express the sense of Congress that this "rebirthing" therapy is dangerous and should be prohibited. This therapeutic technique is not recognized by any professional psychological groups, and many have specifically denounced the practice, including the American Psychological Association, the American Psychiatric Association, the Judge David Bazelon Center for Mental Health, and the National Council for Adoption. I encourage all States to outlaw this voodoo science and prevent another tragedy from happening.

Candace's grandparents, David and Mary Davis, who are my constituents and who are here today, have been tireless advocates for outlawing this procedure. They do not want their granddaughter to have died in vain.

I ask my colleagues to join me in passing this resolution to ensure States to outlaw this procedure.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution, H. Con. Res. 435.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds of those present have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

ROLLAN D. MELTON POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4102) to designate the facility of the United States Postal Service located at 120 North Maine Street in Fallon, Nevada, as the "Rollan D. Melton Post Office Building."

H.R. 4102

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ROLLAN D. MELTON POST OFFICE BUILDING.

(a) DESIGNATION.—The facility of the United States Postal Service located at 120 North Maine Street in Fallon, Nevada, shall be known and designated as the "Rollan D. Melton Post Office Building".

(b) REFERENCES.—Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, paper, or other record of the United States to the facility referred to in subsection (a) shall be deemed to be a reference to the Rollan D. Melton Post Office Building.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Utah (Mr. CANNON) and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TIERNEY) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Utah (Mr. CANNON).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill under consideration, H.R. 4102.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOOZMAN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4102, introduced by our distinguished colleague from Nevada (Mr. GIBBONS) designates the facility of the United States Postal Service in Fallon, Nevada, as the Rollan D. Melton Post Office Building. All Members of the House delegation from the State of Nevada are cosponsors of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, Rollan Melton was a credit to the field of journalism and a devoted resident of the town of Fallon in the gentleman from Nevada's (Mr. GIBBONS) district. At this time, Mr. Speaker, the sponsor of the legislation, the gentleman from Nevada (Mr. GIBBONS), has asked me to read a statement on his behalf because he regrets that he is unable to be here today.

"It is only fitting that this post office, which is an integral part of the Fallon community, be named after the man who dedicated his life to the town, its people, and the goal of keeping small communities like Fallon connected to the world through their local newspaper.

"A prominent resident of Fallon, Nevada, Rollan Melton established a remarkable career in journalism and never forgot his hometown roots.

"Born July 21, 1931, in Boise, Idaho, Rollan Melton moved to Fallon as a young boy. He played football for the Fallon High School and went on to the University of Nevada on a Harold's Club scholarship. He always appreciated his Fallon years and would later endow a scholarship at Fallon's Churchill County High School to celebrate the help he had from his high school teachers and coaches.

"As a young man, Melton quickly embarked on a career of journalism. He would write for the London Observer, the Wall Street Journal and several New York City papers. Yet, Melton loved his home State of Nevada and in 1957, he joined the Reno Evening Gazette where he could write about his hometown and the surrounding communities.

"He would hold various positions at the paper including reporter, sports editor, telegraph editor, promotion manager, and, finally, editor and publisher of the paper which would become known as the Reno Gazette-Journal.

"Throughout his newspaper career, he remained active in numerous philanthropic organizations. He served as a trustee and officer of the Jon Ben Snow Trust based at Syracuse, New York. The trust gives about $300,000 in grants each year in Nevada.

"Melton was also a member of the Nevada Board of Regents, earning the designation of a Distinguished Nevadan.

"Of all his positions, the one he loved the most was columnist, and he wrote frequently about Fallon and its people. On November 30, 2001, Melton was inducted into the Nevada Writers Hall of Fame. He was also named to the Nevada Newspaper Hall of Fame.

"Melton completed 23 years of column writing in October 2001. His first book, Nevadans, was published in 1988. His second, an autobiography entitled Sonny's Story, was published by the University of Nevada in 1988. And the third book, 101 Nevada Columns, was published on his 70th birthday on 2001.

"As a distinguished writer, Rollan Melton found his inspiration in the people of Nevada. Naming the Fallon Post Office in his honor would be a great tribute to his work and commitment to the Silver State and to the town he loved so much, Fallon, Nevada."

Mr. Speaker, this concludes the statement from the gentleman from Nevada (Mr. GIBBONS).

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of H.R. 4102.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague who, as usual, is doing a great job on this for his colleague and for the entire delegation over there.

Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the House Committee on Government Reform and I am pleased to join the gentleman in the consideration of H.R. 4102 which names that post office in Fallon, Nevada, for the late Rollan D. Melton.

Mr. Speaker, As a member of the House Committee on Government Reform, I am pleased to join my colleagues in the consideration of H.R. 4102, which names a post office in Fallon, Nevada, after the late Rollan D. Melton, H.R. 4102, which enjoys the support and cosponsorship of the entire Nevada delegation, was introduced by the gentleman from Nevada (Mr. GIBBONS (R-NV)) on April 9, 2002.

Mr. Rollon Melton graduated from the University of Nevada in 1955. A journalism major, Rollon served as the sports editor of the campus paper, "Sagebrush" and worked as the city editor of a Nevada weekly. In 1957, he joined the Reno Evening Gazette as a reporter, eventually rising to the position of editor and publisher.

As Chairman and CEO of Speidel Newspapers, Mr. Melton negotiated the Speidel merger with Gannett in 1977, and served on the Gannett board for two years. In 1979, he was chosen as a Distinguished Nevadan.

An avid supporter of a sound college education, Mr. Melton served as an interim dean of the Reynolds School of Journalism. He was also a member of the advisory board for the Reynolds School of Journalism, Sigma Delta Chi Journalism Society and the College of Arts and Science.

Active in fine arts and educational programs, Mr. Melton continued to remain a columnist for the Reno Gazette-Journal until his death on January 13, 2002.

Mr. Speaker, I comment the gentleman from Nevada (Mr. GIBBONS) for seeking to honor Rollon D. Melton by naming a post office after him in his adopted city of Fallon, Nevada and urge the swift passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill under consideration, H.R. 5333.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5333, sponsored by our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN), designates the facility of the United States Postal Service in Worcester, Massachusetts as the Joseph D. Early Post Office Building. All Members of the House delegation from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are cosponsors of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, with this legislation we honor a man who has been a fixture in Massachusetts politics for over 40 years.

Joseph Early was born and raised in Worcester and attended the College of Holy Cross. Early was the captain of the Holy Cross Crusaders basketball squad that won the 1954 National Invitational Tournament, at that time the major tournament in America, I might point out.

After college he served in the United States Navy before returning to Worcester to teach and coach basketball. Early began his long career of service to the people of Worcester in 1962 when he was elected to the Massachusetts State House. He served until his election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1974. He served in this body until 1993.

Here in the House Mr. Early sat on the Committee on Appropriations and tirelessly but quietly advocated the causes important to himself and to his constituents. His stewardship of the National Institutes of Health is especially noteworthy and undoubtedly resulted in many medical advances.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of H.R. 5333.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this is, in fact, a bill that was presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN) and cosponsored by all of the Members from that delegation.

Mr. Early has, in fact, served a distinguished career in Massachusetts. It was mentioned by my colleague from Utah (Mr. CANNON), he was a Worcester, Massachusetts native, born in 1933. He went through the schools in Worcester and the College of the Holy Cross. He graduated from there in 1955. He served in the United States Navy and after that was a teacher and a coach. He has been a member of the Massachusetts House. He was a staunch Democrat. He was also a delegate to many conventions and elected to this House in the 94th Congress and served in eight successive Congresses after that.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MCGOVERN).

Mr. MCGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me time, and I want to also thank him for his assistance in moving this measure forward. As well, I want to thank the gentleman from Utah (Mr. CANNON) for his kind words.

Mr. Speaker, today citizens across the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are going to the polls to cast their votes in the State's primary election. It is certainly fitting that on this same day, the House of Representatives votes to honor one of Massachusetts' long-serving and distinguished Members of Congress, Joseph D. Early.

I am proud to be joined by the entire Massachusetts delegation in expressing unanimous support for H.R. 5333, a bill to designate a facility of the U.S. Postal Service in Worcester, Massachusetts, as the Joseph D. Early Post Office Building.

As both a predecessor of mine in Congress and as a cherished friend, I am proud to have sponsored this legislation which will properly honor Joe Early with a Federal building to bear his name.

Mr. Speaker, Joe Early is undeniably one of the City of Worcester's favorite sons. Long before the Jesse Burkett Little League team of this year, Joe Early brought national prominence to the City of Worcester as cocaptain of the Holy Cross College basketball team that won the 1954 National Invitational Tournament. The same tenacity Joe regularly demonstrated on the hardwood later proved to be the hallmark of a remarkable career in public service.

First elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives in 1962, Joe rose through the ranks to ultimately become Vice Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. In the legislature, Joe earned a reputation as a forceful advocate for social programs and a staunch supporter of organized labor. This unwavering commitment to New Deal principles remained firmly intact when Joe Early arrived as a newly elected Member of Congress in 1975.

As a Member of the House Committee on Appropriations, Joe continued to fight doggedly for funding for education, health care and social services. Senior citizens, most notably the frail elderly, never had a more loyal friend or passionate ally in their struggle to retain health care benefits in the late 1980s than Joe Early. In an era of shrinking domestic spending, Joe repeatedly cautioned his colleagues to not forsake our priorities at home.

He was the guardian at the gate for medical research funding, and the National Institutes of Health in particular benefitted greatly from his vigilance on the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services and Education of the Committee on Appropriations.

Many of the recent advances in the treatment of chronic disease can be attributed in no small measure to Joe's steadfast support of the NIH. Today, people here and around the world live healthier lives because of Joe Early; and while he may not be a household name, he will forever be remembered within the medical research community as a true champion of their cause.

Joe's persistent work in his committee was rivaled only by a fierce devotion to his constituents at home. There are countless untold stories of the assistance performed by Joe on behalf of a family in need. No problem was too big and no person was too small to receive the personal attention and intervention of Congressman Early.

Joe's constituent service was renowned as was his relentless pursuit of funding for the Third District of Massachusetts. The University of Massachusetts Medical School stands as only one shining example of Joe Early's tireless efforts to ensure his district receive its fair share.

Mr. Speaker, in our business there are show horses and there are work horses. Joe Early was the consummate work horse. He never sought the glory of the spotlight or rushed to grab a headline. Joe was content to let others receive the credit while he worked quietly and effectively on the issues and for the constituents he cared so deeply about. In that respect, Joe Early is very much like the district he represented for 18 years. In fact, it has been said that Joe Early did not represent his beloved City of Worcester as much as he personified its three-decker homes and blue-collar work ethic.

Mr. Speaker, in that spirit, we shall pass this legislation to name a post office building in Worcester for Congressman Joseph D. Early as a small tribute to a great man who humbly and selflessly has given so much of his life in service to others.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Massachusetts (Mr. TIERNEY) for his generosity in yielding me time and for his leadership on this issue.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Utah (Mr. CANNON) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5333.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds of those present have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

(1) in paragraph (1), by inserting “of section 8117 of title 38, United States Code” after “subsection (a)”; and

(2) in paragraph (2), by striking “subsections (b) through (f)” and inserting “subsection (b)(1) of this section and subsections (b) through (f) of section 8117 of title 38, United States Code”.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOOZMAN). Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. EVANS) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH).

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to bring to the floor legislation that I introduced almost a year ago to respond to the diabolical terrorist attacks of September 11 and the anthrax attacks that followed.

The legislation, H.R. 3253, as amended, the Department of Veterans Affairs Emergency Preparedness Act of 2002, provides the Federal Government with another tool to prevent or, if necessary, respond to future acts of terrorism against the United States. This legislation is designed to mobilize the underappreciated strength of the VA health care infrastructure in defending our Nation against future acts of terrorism.

Although it may come as a surprise to many, the Department of Veterans Affairs operates our Nation's largest integrated health care network, with over 200,000 health care practitioners, 163 medical centers, more than 800 outpatient clinics, 115 medical research programs, affiliations with over 100 schools of medicine, and a $25 billion annual budget including over $1 billion for research programs.

The VA health care system must, Madam Speaker, be an integral component of any homeland security strategy. In fact, the VA already does have defined roles in both the National Disaster Medical System and the Federal Response Plan in the event of national emergencies.

Among the VA's current specialized duties are, one, conducting and evaluating disaster and terrorist attack simulation exercises; second, managing the Nation's stockpile of drugs to counter the effects of chemical and biological poisons; third, maintaining a rapid response team for radioactive releases; and, fourth, training public and private NDMS medical center personnel around the country in properly responding to biological, chemical, or radiological disasters.

H.R. 3253 was developed in order to apply the existing experience and expertise in the VA's health care research programs as a defensive tool in the war on terrorism.

Madam Speaker, I know from my own experience with the anthrax attacks last October, which hit my own district and hit it hard in central New Jersey in Hamilton Township, putting thousands of dedicated postal workers and the public as well at risk, that we need to move very quickly, develop new tests and new treatments for anthrax and scores of other biological and dangerous chemical agents and radiological weapons that might be employed by terrorists.

When anthrax was discovered in the Hamilton Post Office, I was astounded to discover that there were no existing protocols to test, quarantine, or treat victims. The confusion that emanated, the fog, if my colleagues will, that followed the discovery of anthrax made a bad situation even worse. I saw it over and over again, well-intentioned experts from the departments of health,

State and Federal, CDC and the like were flying by the seat of their collective pants. Far too many pertinent questions were not answered and were not answered with scientific or any kind of precision.

It was during that crisis, frankly, that I thought that we needed to develop a new policy that would establish protocols which would try to deal with the details before the unthinkable, which now had become thinkable, actually happened; and that was the genesis of this legislation.

H.R. 3253, we believe, will marshal some of our Nation's best and brightest scientists in a focused effort to develop new protocols for testing, vaccinating, and treating our citizens who may be victims of biological, chemical, or radiological terrorism.

Madam Speaker, the House previously approved H.R. 3253, as amended, on May 20. I am very grateful that the Senate passed an amended bill on August 1. The bill before us today represents the compromise language agreed to after discussions and negotiations between the House and the Senate Committees on Veterans' Affairs.

As amended, H.R. 3253 will authorize the VA to establish four National Medical Preparedness Centers. These centers would undertake research and develop new protocols for detecting, diagnosing, vaccinating, and treating potential victims of terrorism. In particular, the centers would focus on ways to prevent and treat victims of biological, chemical, and radiological or explosive terrorist acts.

The new centers would conduct direct research and coordinate ongoing and promising new research with affiliated universities and other government agencies. These centers would serve as training resources for thousands of community hospital staffs; hazardous materials, HAZMAT teams; emergency medical technicians, EMTs; and firefighters and police officers, who must be the first medical responders in the event of terrorist attacks.

The emergency preparedness centers would also be charged with establishing state-of-the-art laboratories to help local health officials detect the presence of dangerous biological and chemical poisons.

The funding to support these centers would come from the additional funds provided for combating terrorism and would not use or otherwise reduce funding for veterans' health care.

Under the compromise agreement reached with the Senate, VA's authority to provide emergency medical treatment would be expanded to include first responders, other Federal agencies, veterans not enrolled in the VA health care system, active duty service members, and others receiving VA care in declared domestic emergencies. Reimbursements collected for the cost of care, whether coming from FEMA, the Department of Defense, or an insurance company, would be credited to the VA's Medical Care Collections Fund, the same as in other VA collection efforts.

In addition, a new Assistant Secretary for preparedness security and law enforcement would be established at the VA.

Finally, Madam Speaker, the compromise bill would codify in title 38 of the U.S. Code various provisions from Public Law 107-188, the "Public Health Security and Bioterrorism Preparedness and Response Act of 2002," that pertain to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Madam Speaker, as we pass the 1-year anniversary of 9-11 and the subsequent anthrax attacks, we are all thankful that no additional acts of terror have been carried out against the United States. However, there can be no doubt that serious dangers and threats remain. Our government must remain vigilant in defending and protecting our citizens from every threat, of any kind, and H.R. 3253 is another step towards homeland security. I urge all Members to support this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I include for the RECORD the Explanatory Statement on the House Amendment.

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT ON HOUSE AMENDMENT TO SENATE AMENDMENTS TO H.R. 3253

The House amendment to the Senate amendments to H.R. 3253 reflects a Compromise Agreement that the House and Senate Committees on Veterans' Affairs have reached on H.R. 3253 and S. 2132. H.R. 3253 (hereinafter known as the "House bill") passed the House on May 20, 2002. The Senate considered S. 2132 (hereinafter known as the "Senate bill") on August 1, 2002. This measure was incorporated in H.R. 3253 as an amendment and passed the Senate by unanimous consent on August 1, 2002.

The House and Senate Committees on Veterans' Affairs have prepared the following explanations of H.R. 3253, as amended (hereinafter referred to as the "Compromise Agreement"). Differences between the preparedness provisions contained in the Compromise Agreement and the related provisions of H.R. 3253 and S. 2132 are noted in this document, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by the Compromise Agreement, and minor drafting, technical, and clarifying changes.

SHORT TITLE

CURRENT LAW—Public Law 105-368, the "Veterans Programs Enhancement Act of 1998," charged Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) to investigate potential long-term health effects of biological and chemical warfare agents. Under current law, the VA does not possess specific authority to establish centers dedicated to research, education, and training activities related to managing the health consequences of terrorist use of weapons of mass destruction.

HOUSE BILL—Section 1 of H.R. 3253 provides that the short title of the bill is the "Department of Veterans Affairs Emergency Preparedness Research, Education, and Bio-Terrorism Prevention Act of 2002".

SENATE BILL—Section 1 of S. 2132 provides that the short title of the bill is the "Department of Veterans Affairs Emergency Preparedness Act of 2002".

COMPROMISE AGREEMENT—Section 1 of the Compromise Agreement would adopt the Senate language.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MEDICAL EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS RESEARCH CENTERS AT DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS MEDICAL CENTERS

CURRENT LAW—No provision.

HOUSE BILL—Section 2(a) of H.R. 3253 would amend Chapter 73 of title 38, United States Code, by establishing a new section 7325.

Subsection (a) of section 7325 of title 38, United States Code, would require the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to establish at least four national medical emergency preparedness centers at existing VA medical centers, to be staffed with department employees. The Under Secretary for Health, in consultation with the assistant secretary for operations, preparedness, and security, would be responsible for supervising and evaluating the operation of these centers.

Proposed section 7325(b) of title 38, United States Code, would define the centers' threefold mission as follows: (1) to conduct research and development into "detection, diagnosis, vaccination, protection, and treatment for chemical, biological and radiological threats;" (2) to provide education, training, and expert advice to department and community health-care practitioners; and (3) to provide "contingent rapid response laboratory assistance" to local health-care authorities during national emergencies. The House bill would specify that at least one center concentrate solely on biological threats, one on chemical threats, and one on radiological threats to public health and safety.

Proposed section 7325(c) of title 38, United States Code, would define qualifications for center directors, and section 7325(d) would direct the Secretary to designate sites through a competitive selection process. Proposed section 7325(g) would establish a consulting peer-review panel, including experts in relevant fields, to assist the Under Secretary for Health in evaluating the scientific and clinical merits to proposals and offering recommendations concerning site designations for the four centers.

Paragraph 2 of proposed section 7325(d) of title 38, United States Code, would require that a candidate site demonstrate the ability to attract qualified scientists; develop arrangements with at least one accredited, affiliated school of medicine and school of public health; be affiliated with a graduate program in epidemiology; and offer training and education programs for nursing, social work, counseling, and/or other allied health personnel.

Subsection (e) of the proposed section 7325 of title 38, United States Code, would authorize to be appropriated $20 million for each of fiscal years 2003–2007, and would authorize the Under Secretary for Health to expend Medical Care funds as appropriate for the support of such centers, in coordination with the assistant secretary with responsibility for operations, preparedness, and security. Subsection (f) of the proposed section 7325 would authorize each center to seek other public or private research funds to fulfill its research mission.

Proposed section 7325(h) of title 38, United States Code, would require that VA make the centers' findings available to health-care providers in the United States through publications and medical education programs, and that research programs be coordinated and shared with other Federal departments and agencies. The House bill would authorize the Department to assist Federal, State, and local civil and criminal authorities upon request to deal with biological, chemical, or radiological threats. Proposed subsection (j) of section 7325 would authorize details on a non-reimbursable basis of other Federal employees to assist the centers in accomplishing center missions.

SENATE BILL—Section 101 in the Senate bill would add section 7320A to title 38, United States Code.

Proposed section 7320A in the Senate bill would establish four centers to carry out research on "the detection, diagnosis, prevention, and treatment of injuries, diseases, and illnesses arising from the use of chemical, biological, radiological, or incendiary or other explosive weapons or devices." This section would require that centers provide education and training to VA health-care professionals, and to non-VA professionals at the direction of the Secretary through the National Disaster Medical System (hereinafter "NDMS") or other interagency agreements. This section would also authorize the Secretary to provide appropriate "laboratory, epidemiological, medical, or other assistance" to Federal, State, and local health-care agencies and personnel involved in or responding to a national emergency. The Senate bill would not assign specific areas of research to single centers.

The Senate bill would require that the Secretary designate centers after peer review of competitive proposals submitted by existing qualified VA medical centers. The Senate bill would require the same qualifications as the House bill, but would require geographic dispersal "to the maximum extent practicable."

The Senate bill would require the offices responsible for directing research and medical emergency preparedness to administer the centers. This section would require those offices to work in close coordination with the Departments of Defense and Health and Human Services, the Office of Homeland Security, and other agencies, interagency working groups, or committees charged with coordinating Federal research into the response to casualties caused by terrorist use of weapons of mass destruction.

Subsection (e) of proposed section 7320A would require that centers be staffed by VA employees or employees detailed from other Federal agencies, on a non-reimbursable basis.

Proposed section (f) section 7320A would authorize the Secretary to provide assistance to Federal, State, and local agencies engaged in investigations or inquiries to protect against threats posed by terrorist use of weapons of mass destruction. Proposed section 7320A(g) would authorize the centers to seek grants from outside sources, and would authorize to be appropriated $20 million for each of fiscal years 2003–2007.

COMPROMISE AGREEMENT—The Compromise Agreement would incorporate the Senate provisions in proposed section 7325 of title 38, United States Code, authorizing a total of four medical emergency preparedness centers, dispersed geographically to the maximum extent practicable. The Committees intend for VA to select sites based upon the strength of existing resources and scientific merit of the proposals; although regional distribution of these centers would be encouraged, predicted research productivity should be paramount in designating sites.

The proposed section 7325(a) of title 38, United States Code, would follow the House bill assigning responsibility for operation and supervision of the centers to the Under Secretary for Health, in consultation with the assistant secretary with responsibility for operations, preparedness, security, and law enforcement. The Compromise Agreement would not include House language defining qualifications for center directors. The centers would be situated organizationally within the Veterans Health Administration (VHA) and would report to the Under Secretary for Health. Nevertheless, the research products and educational tools arising from the work of the centers would link directly to the mission and function that the compromise Agreement would assign to the assistant secretary responsible for operations, preparedness, security and law enforcement. Thus, there would be a clearly defined line of accountability and coordination among the centers and the responsible departmental officials. This need is clearly acknowledged in the Compromise Agreement by the requirement to link the Under Secretary's decisions with regard to the operations of the centers to the work of the assistant secretary.

Proposed section 7325(b)(1) of title 38, United States Code, in the Compromise Agreement would follow the Senate language by substituting "prevention" for "vaccination and protection," and adding to the list of potential threats incendiary and other explosive sources. The Committees agree that contingency planning would include an all-hazards approach and acknowledge that strategies for mass casualty management overlap, irrespective of the particular nature of a terrorist attack or source of other mass-casualty disaster. The Compromise Agreement would not require individual centers to be dedicated to specific fields of study. Nevertheless, the Compromise Agreement would allow the Department to pursue multiple approaches to the medical management of mass casualties. In exercising the authority, the Department could designate any, some, or none of the centers as lead agent for developing subject matter expertise in a particular focused research area dealing with bioterrorism.

Proposed section 7325(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, would require centers to provide education, training, and advice to health-care professionals within VHA as proposed in both bills, but would follow the Senate language to specify that such training be provided to outside professionals and practitioners through the NDMS as authorized by Public Law 107-188, the "Public Health Security and Bioterrorism Preparedness and Response Act of 2002," or through specific interagency agreements executed for the purpose. The committees intend that VA take steps to ensure that potentially valuable research findings and educational developments in medical emergency preparedness be translated from the centers into clinical practice as quickly as practicable, but that VA accomplish this task through channels established as part of VA's role in existing federal response partnerships and the evolving U.S. national homeland security policy.

Proposed section 7325(b)(3) of title 38, United States Code, would adapt language from both bills authorizing centers to provide such laboratory, epidemiological, medical, or other assistance as the Secretary considers appropriate to Federal, State, and local health-care agencies and personnel in the event of a disaster or emergency.

Proposed section 7325(c) of title 38, United States Code, would direct the Secretary to select sites for centers as delineated in language shared by both bills, following the House language that would require proposals for the designation of centers be coordinated between the United Secretary for Health and the assistant secretary for operations, preparedness, and security, and be subject to a scientific peer-review process. The Compromise Agreement would follow House language describing the composition of the peer-review panel, but would replace the term "bio-hazards management education and training" with the term "infectious diseases," in describing the types of expertise called for in such peer-review panel participation. The Compromise Agreement would also follow House language requiring that to be qualified, centers would need to develop an arrangement under which nursing, social work, counseling, or allied health personnel would receive training and education from the centers, in addition to other provisions shared by both bills.

Sections 7325(d) and (e) of title 38, United States Code, would adopt the House language on research activities and dissemination of research products. Section 7325(f) would follow the Senate language requiring that research be coordinated with departments, agencies, and working groups charged with coordinating Federal research into responses to weapons of mass destruction.

Proposed section 7325(i) of title 38, United States Code, in the Compromise Agreement, would follow House language on the authorization of appropriations to support the efforts of these centers.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING PROGRAMS ON MEDICAL RESPONSES TO CONSEQUENCES OF TERRORIST ACTIVITIES

HOUSE BILL—Section 3(a) of the House bill would amend chapter 73 of title 38, United States Code, by adding a new section 7326.

Section 7326(a), of title 38, United States Code, would require the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to develop and disseminate programs to educate and train health-care professionals to respond to the consequences of terrorist activities.

Proposed section 7326(b), of title 38, United States Code, would designate the Under Secretary for Health, in consultation with the assistance secretary responsible for operations, preparedness and security, as the implementing officials or entity.

Under section 7326(c), of title 38, United States Code, the education and training programs currently established at the F. Edward Hebert School of Medicine of the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences would provide baseline national curriculum and clinical protocols for training health-care professionals.

Section 7326(d), of title 38, United States Code, would require the education and training programs to cover the needs of health-care professionals at every level of learning and in a variety of fields.

Under section 7326(e), of title 38, United States Code, the Secretary would be required to consult with the accrediting, certifying and coordinating bodies representing the various fields of health professions' education.

Section 3(b), of the House bill would require the Secretaries to implement this section within 90 days of enactment.

SENATE BILL—The Senate bill contains no comparable provisions.

COMPROMISE AGREEMENT—Section 3 of the Compromise Agreement would follow the House language with one amendment requiring that programs be designed for health-care professionals "in Department medical centers."

AUTHORITY TO FURNISH HEALTH CARE DURING MAJOR DISASTERS AND MEDICAL EMERGENCIES

CURRENT LAW—Section 8111A of title 38, United States Code, authorizes VA to serve as a supportive contingency health-care system to the Department of Defense, requiring VA to furnish hospital care, nursing home care, and medical services to members of the Armed Forces on active duty during and following a period of foreign war. This provision addresses the potential needs of post-deployment forces following an armed conflict abroad, when active-duty military casualties might quickly overwhelm available military treatment facility resources. Under section 1784 of title 38, United States Code, the Secretary is authorized to "furnish hospital care or medical services as a humanitarian service in emergency cases, but the Secretary shall charge for such care and services at rates prescribed by the Secretary." The authority of section 1784 addresses humanitarian care provided by the Department to non-veterans.

Neither provision authorizes VA to care for active-duty military casualties following a domestic disaster or conflict, a possibility that must be acknowledged following the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington on September 11, 2001. In addition, current law does not recognize VA's already considerable commitment to providing emergency care during disasters as part of the Federal Response Plan established under Executive Orders 12148 and 12656.

HOUSE BILL—The House bill contains no comparable provisions.

SENATE BILL—Section 301(a) of the Senate bill would add a new section 1785 to title 38, United States Code, to authorize the Secretary to furnish hospital care and medical services to individuals responding to, involved in, or otherwise affected by a declared major disaster or emergency, or following activation of the NDMS. Proposed section 1785(c) of title 38, United States Code, would allow VA to care for veterans during such a disaster without regard to enrollment required under section 1705 of title 38, United States Code. Proposed section 1785(d) of title 38, United States Code, would authorize the Secretary to give higher priority to furnishing care to individuals affected by disasters than to anyone except service-connected veterans and members of the Armed Forces receiving care under section 8111A of title 38, United States Code. Proposed section 1785(e)(1) of title 38, United States Code, would authorize VA to be reimbursed for care furnished to an officer or employee of another Federal department or agency, with amounts credited in the Medical Care Collections Fund to the facility providing care. Under proposed section 1785(f) of title 38, United States Code, the Secretary would be required to report to the House and Senate Committees on Veterans' Affairs the volume of care furnished by VA under these provisions.

Section 301(b) of the Senate bill would amend title 38 of the United States Code, section 1784, to provide an exception to the requirement that VA charge individuals for emergency care during a covered disaster or emergency.

Finally, the Senate bill would amend section 8111A of title 38, United States Code, to authorize the Secretary to furnish hospital care or medical services to members of the Armed Forces on active duty in this country, whose need for care is related to their response to a covered disaster or national emergency.

COMPROMISE AGREEMENT—Section 4 of the Compromise Agreement would follow the Senate language, but would amend it by striking references to priorities for furnishing care. Also, the Compromise Agreement would delete language that would have suspended VA charges for emergency care under section 1784 of title 38, United States Code, during disasters.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF ASSISTANT SECRETARIES OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

CURRENT LAW—Section 308 of title 38, United States Code, currently authorizes six assistant secretaries of the Department of Veterans Affairs and 18 deputy assistant secretaries.

HOUSE BILL—Section 4 of the House bill would amend section 308 of title 38, United States Code, by increasing the number of authorized assistant secretaries to "seven" and would amend subsection (b) of that section by adding "operations, preparedness, security, and law enforcement functions" to currently authorized functions.

SENATE BILL—Section 201 of the Senate bill is identical to section 4 of the House bill. Section 202 of the Senate bill would amend section 308(d)(1) of title 38, United States Code, by increasing the number of authorized deputy assistant secretaries from 18 to 20.

COMPROMISE AGREEMENT—Sections 6(a) and (b) of the Compromise Agreement would follow identical provisions from both bills. Section 6(c) of the Compromise Agreement would increase the number of deputy assistant secretaries from 18 to 19. The Committees urge the Secretary to examine the deployment of existing deputy assistant secretaries to ensure that the Department is properly staffed with deputy assistant secretaries to fulfill its various functions and missions.

CODIFICATION OF DUTIES OF SECRETARY OF VETERANS AFFAIRS RELATING TO EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

CURRENT LAW—Section 154 of Public Law 107-188, the "Public Health Security and Biodefense Preparedness and Response Act of 2002," enacted on June 12, 2002, mandated a series of responsibilities for the Secretary of Veterans Affairs related to bioterrorism and other emergency preparedness functions.

HOUSE BILL—The House bill contains no comparable provisions.

SENATE BILL—The Senate bill contains no comparable provisions.

COMPROMISE AGREEMENT—The Compromise Agreement is intended to codify authorities related to the Secretary's emergency preparedness duties, enacted in Public Law 107-188 into chapter 81 of title 38, United States Code.

The Compromise Agreement would add a new section 8117 to title 38, United States Code. Proposed section 8117(a) codifies the requirement that the Secretary provide for the readiness of VA medical centers against chemical or biological attacks in order to protect patients and staff and to fulfill other emergency response missions. Proposed section 8117(a)(2) codifies the requirement that these preparations include provision and training in the use of decontamination and personal protection equipment.

Proposed section 8117(b) of title 38, United States Code, would codify the requirement that the Secretary provide for the security of VA medical and research facilities, taking into account the security evaluation required by section 154(b)(1) of Public Law 107-188.

Proposed section 8117(c) of title 38, United States Code, would codify the requirement that the Secretary develop and maintain a centralized system for tracking the location and availability of pharmaceuticals, medical supplies, and medical equipment throughout the VA's health-care system so that these items might be accessed quickly during disasters.

Proposed section 8117(d) of title 38, United States Code, would codify the requirement that the Secretary ensure that VA medical centers, in consultation with affiliated medical schools, take steps to train resident physicians and other health-care personnel in the potential medical consequences of a terrorist attack.

Proposed section 8117(e) of title 38, United States Code, would codify the requirement that the Secretary establish and maintain a training program for VA health-care professionals and their community partners in the NDMS, in accordance with recommendations of the bioterrorism preparedness working group established in title 42, United States Code, and in consultation with the other NDMS Federal partners.

Proposed section 8117(f) of title 38, United States Code, would codify the requirement that the Secretary develop and maintain strategies that would allow VA expert personnel to provide mental health assistance, including counseling and assistance for post-traumatic stress disorder, following a terrorist attack or other public health emergency. Such a strategy would be developed in consultation with the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the American Red Cross and the bioterrorism preparedness working group established in title 42, United States Code. The Secretary would be responsible for training and coordinating VA providers in the treatment of veterans, emergency responders, active-duty military personnel, or others seeking care at a VA medical center.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. EVANS. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I rise in strong support of the Veterans Affairs Emergency Preparedness Act, as amended. After the tragic events of September 11 last year, our chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH), again demonstrated his leadership. Chairman SMITH introduced legislation authorizing an important role for the Department of the VA in our Nation's fight against terrorism. That is the primary purpose of this measure today.

It provides medical care to millions of veterans each year and conducts groundbreaking health care research, and it also provides educational opportunities to many of our Nation's health care providers.

The VA is truly an unparalleled national resource. This legislation provides the structure and the authority for the VA to leverage its expertise to combat terrorism. For the VA to achieve this goal, it must have adequate resources.

Today, the Veterans Affairs does not have enough resources. That is not my judgment, but it is the judgment of the Task Force to Improve Health Care Delivery to Veterans established by President Bush. I call on the President to fully fund the VA. I ask him to provide all funding the VA needs to deliver timely, quality care to our veterans, today and tomorrow; provide the resources the VA needs to combat terrorism. And I thank the chairman once again for his leadership.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Madam Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. MORAN), the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Health.

Mr. MORAN of Kansas. Madam Speaker, since September 11, our Nation has been made to reevaluate every action we undertake. A year after the attacks on New York and in Washington and the plane crash in Pennsylvania, we are still at a heightened state of alert. What we once considered a safe Nation has now become a people concerned about security. The citizens of America are looking now, more than ever, to Congress and to the President for answers.

The legislation before us, H.R. 3253, would use the assets and expertise of the Department of Veterans Affairs to help protect the people of the United States from terrorists. Our government must be proactive in preparing the United States for future terrorist attacks. As Vice President CHENEY cautioned earlier this year, "The prospects of a future attack against the United States are almost certain." We must respond in a timely, effective and comprehensive manner to protect the American people when an attack occurs. This bill would help do just that.

Under this bill, four geographically separated National Medical Emergency Preparedness centers would be established. Each center would study and work toward solutions to health consequences that arise from exposure to chemical, biological, explosive, and nuclear substances used as weapons of mass destruction.

The VA is prepared to handle this new and important mission. In addition to its medical care mission to care for millions of American veterans, the veterans health care system is the Nation's largest health care provider of graduate medical education and a major contributor to biomedical and other scientific research. Because of this widely dispersed, integrated health care system, the VA can be, and has been in the past, an essential asset in responding to national emergencies.

Not only would the four special centers conduct research and develop methods of detection, diagnosis, prevention, and treatment; but they would also be charged with the dissemination of the latest information to other public and private health care providers, to improve the quality of care for patients who may be exposed to deadly chemicals, radiation, or other terrorist weapons of mass destruction.

This bill would also require the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to carry out a program to develop and disseminate model education and training programs on the medical responses to terrorist activities. The VA's infrastructure, which includes affiliation with over 107 medical schools, and other schools of health professions, would enable current and future medical professionals in this country to be knowledgeable and medically competent in the treatment of casualties from terrorist attacks. Our bill provides the VA a formal role in the national disaster medical system and authorizes the VA to treat first responders, active duty forces, firefighters, police officers and members of the general public that may be victims of terrorism or other mass casualty disasters.

With this bill, the VA health care professionals will be properly armed with information and education on bioterrorism response. Mechanisms will be put in place to study the likely avenues and methods of chemical, biological, and radiological poisoning; and the VA will be part of the rapid response by Federal, State, and local officials in types of emergencies that only a year ago we could scarcely imagine.

H.R. 3253 is a bipartisan and bicameral compromise; and, Madam Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this effort in America's war on terrorism.

Mr. EVANS. Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume, and I just want to begin by thanking my very good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. EVANS), for his work on this legislation. We have served together on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs for longer than 20 years; and he has been a true advocate for veterans, and on this legislation, like on the others, has been a great friend and ally as we work in tandem to try to bring good, solid pieces of legislation to the floor. So I want to thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. EVANS) for that good work.

I want to thank Michael Durishin and Susan Edgerton, who are two of his top staffers, who again worked very, very tirelessly with our own staff here on the majority side; and again, these bills, the details of which are very much worked over and vetted, would not happen without that kind of cooperation. So I do want to thank them as well.

The gentleman from Kansas (Mr. MORAN), who just spoke, and the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER), the chairman and the ranking member of the Subcommittee on Health, and the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BUYER) also, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations, worked on this legislation as well; and I want to thank them.

I want to thank our own staff, Pat Ryan, Kingston Smith, Jeannie McNally, Peter Dickinson, Kathleen Greve and John Bradley, who all had input into this legislation, and, we have held hearings on it. One of them was one of those day-long hearings. We had four panels. We heard from experts, and again, I think we all were astonished at the lack of response when it came to these capabilities.

As I alluded to earlier in my comments, I thought when I sat in those meetings in Trenton and Hamilton and Mercer County, where there was this befuddled look on the part of very well-meaning experts in the field about what do we do about anthrax, has it been spread through cross-contamination, what are the risks, how often and how long and to whom should Cipro or Doxycycline be administered.

There were a million and one questions and very few answers because those questions had not been considered in advance; and that is what this legislation is all about, to establish centers of excellence that seek to find out, if this kind of event happens, what is prescribed, what is the consequence. Just today in The Washington Times, there was an excellent op-ed piece by a doctor who heads up the emergency room physicians, pointing out that the first responders, as they rush in to help in a situation, smallpox, anthrax, sarin, just name it, will not have a clue what it is they need to do to prepare themselves, to protect themselves and preclude contamination.

So it is very important that these details be worked out in advance, coordinating with other agencies of the government. The VA has shown in the past it has a unique perspective and an expertise to bring to bear on this.

Madam Speaker, I also thank our Senate colleagues. Senator ROCKEFELLER worked on this and got legislation passed. It was a very cooperative effort. They added some very meaningful language to the bill, so we ended up with a very good hybrid that will go to the President for signature. I also thank Senator SPECTER, the ranking member. In addition, I appreciate the efforts of the Senate staff, Bill Tuerk and Kim Lipsky, David Goetz and Bill Cahill, and I especially thank Julie Fischer, who has been Senator ROCKEFELLER's top aide, who worked with the other side of the aisle to craft a good bill. This bill has been endorsed by the administration. Now we will work on getting this bill signed, implemented, and then we will do oversight on its implementation.

Mr. RODRIGUEZ. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of the amended version of H.R. 3253, the Emergency Preparedness Act. As an original co-sponsor of H.R. 3253, I recognize the significant role the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) can play in our quest as a nation to restore a sense of security following the horrific events of September 11, 2001 and the subsequent anthrax attacks. This measure would authorize the VA to become a full partner in our defense efforts through the establishment of four "Medical Emergency Preparedness Centers" at VA hospitals throughout the nation.

These centers would be charged with conducting medical research, and developing health care responses for chemical, biological, radiological, incendiary and explosive threats to the public. The centers would also provide education, training, and advice to VA and outside doctors, and other health care professionals on how to diagnose and treat illnesses caused by exposure to chemical, biological and radioactive materials. Especially important is the role the proposed centers would play in providing rapid response assistance and other aid to local health care authorities in the event of a national emergency.

This legislation recognizes the critical role the VA can play in our homeland security efforts. The VA operates the nation's largest integrated health care network with over 20,000 health care professionals, 163 medical centers, 800 outpatient clinics, 115 medical research centers, and has affiliations with more than 100 medical schools. Several VA facilities have already initiated efforts to serve our country in this effort. For example, the Audie Murphy Memorial Hospital in San Antonio, has developed relationships and shared teaching and research arrangements with various medical school in Texas and the county hospital system. Audie Murphy also works closely with several military medical missions with expertise in chemical, biological and radiological hazards.

The collaborative efforts of veterans health care providers, like Audie Murphy Hospital, not only help veterans, but our nation as a whole. Further, it puts the VA in a critical position to attract high level scientists in fields relevant to bio-chemical and radiological threats. I believe that through the development of National Emergency Preparedness Centers, the VA can become an important partner in our nation's homeland defense efforts.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, H. Res. 526.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL CONSTRUCTION SAFETY TEAM ACT

Mr. BOEHLERT. Madam Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendment to the bill (H.R. 4687) to provide for the establishment of investigative teams to assess building performance and the emergency response and evacuation procedures in the wake of any building failure that has resulted in substantial loss of life or that posed significant potential of substantial loss of life.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "National Construction Safety Team Act".

SEC. 2. NATIONAL CONSTRUCTION SAFETY TEAMS.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Director of the National Institute of Standards and Technology (in this Act referred to as the "Director") is authorized to establish National Construction Safety Teams (in this Act referred to as a "Team") for deployment after events causing the failure of a building or buildings that has resulted in substantial loss of life or that posed significant potential for substantial loss of life. (F) identifying and prescribing appropriate conditions for the provision by the Director of additional resources and services Teams may need;

(G) to ensure that investigations under this Act do not impede and are coordinated with any search and rescue efforts being undertaken at the site of the building failure;

(H) for regular briefings of the public on the status of the investigative proceedings and findings;

(I) guiding the Teams in moving and preserving evidence as described in section 4 (a)(4), (b)(2), and (d)(4);

(J) providing for coordination with Federal, State, and local entities that may sponsor research or investigations of building failures, including research conducted under the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Act of 1977; and

(K) regarding such other issues as the Director considers appropriate.

(2) PUBLICATION.—The Director shall publish promptly in the Federal Register final procedures, and subsequent updates thereof, developed under paragraph (1).

SEC. 3. COMPOSITION OF TEAMS.

Each Team shall be composed of individuals selected by the Director and led by an individual designated by the Director. Team members shall include at least 1 employee of the National Institute of Standards and Technology and shall include other experts who are not employees of the National Institute of Standards and Technology, who may include private sector experts, university experts, representatives of professional organizations with appropriate expertise, and appropriate Federal, State, or local officials. Team members who are not Federal employees shall be considered Federal Government contractors.

SEC. 4. AUTHORITIES.

(a) ENTRY AND INSPECTION.—In investigating a building failure under this Act, members of a Team, and any other person authorized by the Director to support a Team, on display of appropriate credentials provided by the Director and written notice of inspection authority, may—

(1) enter property where a building failure being investigated has occurred, or where building components, materials, and artifacts with respect to the building failure are located, and take action necessary, appropriate, and reasonable in light of the nature of the property to be inspected to carry out the duties of the Team under section 2(b)(2) (A) and (B);

(2) during reasonable hours, inspect any record (including any design, construction, or maintenance record), process, or facility related to the investigation;

(3) inspect and test any building components, materials, and artifacts related to the building failure; and

(4) move such records, components, materials, and artifacts as provided by the procedures developed under section 2(c)(1).

(b) AVOIDING UNNECESSARY INTERFERENCE AND PRESERVING EVIDENCE.—An inspection, test, or other action taken by a Team under this section shall be conducted in a way that—

(1) does not interfere unnecessarily with services provided by the owner or operator of the building components, materials, or artifacts, property, records, process, or facility; and

(2) to the maximum extent feasible, preserves evidence related to the building failure, consistent with the ongoing needs of the investigation.

(c) COORDINATION.—

(3) MEMORANDA OF UNDERSTANDING.—The National Institute of Standards and Technology shall enter into a memorandum of understanding with each Federal agency that may conduct or sponsor a related investigation, providing for coordination of investigations.

(4) WITH STATE AND LOCAL AUTHORITIES.—A Team shall cooperate with State and local authorities carrying out any activities related to a Team's investigation.

(d) INTERAGENCY PRIORITIES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2) or (3), a Team investigation shall have priority over any other investigation of any other Federal agency.

(2) NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION SAFETY BOARD.—If the National Transportation Safety Board is conducting an investigation related to an investigation of a Team, the National Transportation Safety Board investigation shall have priority over the Team investigation. Such priority shall not otherwise affect the authority of the Team to continue its investigation under this Act.

(3) CRIMINAL ACTS.—If the Attorney General, in consultation with the Director, determines, and notifies the Director, that circumstances reasonably indicate that the building failure being investigated by a Team may have been caused by a criminal act, the Team shall relinquish investigative priority to the appropriate law enforcement agency. The relinquishment of investigative priority by the Team shall not otherwise affect the authority of the Team to continue its investigation under this Act.

(4) PRESERVATION OF EVIDENCE.—If a Federal law enforcement agency suspects and notifies the Director that a building failure being investigated by a Team under this Act may have been caused by a criminal act, the Team, in consultation with the Federal law enforcement agency, shall take necessary actions to ensure that evidence of the criminal act is preserved.

SEC. 5. BRIEFINGS, HEARINGS, WITNESSES, AND SUBPOENAS.

(a) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—The Director or his designee, on behalf of a Team, may conduct hearings, administer oaths, and require, by subpoena (pursuant to subsection (e)) and otherwise, necessary witnesses and evidence as necessary to carry out this Act.

(c) PUBLIC HEARINGS.—During the course of an investigation by a Team, the National Institute of Standards and Technology may, if the Director considers it to be in the public interest, hold a public hearing for the purposes of—

(1) gathering testimony from witnesses; and

(2) informing the public on the progress of the investigation.

(d) PRODUCTION OF WITNESSES.—A witness or evidence in an investigation under this Act may be summoned or required to be produced from any place in the United States. A witness summoned under this subsection is entitled to the same fee and mileage the witness would have been paid in a court of the United States.

(e) ISSUANCE OF SUBPOENAS.—A subpoena shall be issued only under the signature of the Director but may be served by any person designated by the Director.

(f) FAILURE TO OBEY SUBPOENA.—If a person disobeys a subpoena issued by the Director under this Act, the Attorney General, acting on behalf of the Director, may bring a civil action in a district court of the United States to enforce the subpoena. An action under this subsection may be brought in the judicial district in which the person against whom the action is brought resides, is found, or does business. The court may punish a failure to obey an order of the court to comply with the subpoena as a contempt of court.

SEC. 6. ADDITIONAL POWERS.

In order to support Teams in carrying out this Act, the Director may—

(1) procure the temporary or intermittent services of experts or consultants under section 3109 of title 5, United States Code;

(1) information described by section 552(b) of title 5, United States Code, or protected from disclosure by any other law of the United States; or

(2) information described in subsection (a) by the National Institute of Standards and Technology or by a Team until the report required by section 8 is issued.

(c) PROTECTION OF VOLUNTARY SUBMISSION OF INFORMATION.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a Team, the National Institute of Standards and Technology, and any agency receiving information from a Team or the National Institute of Standards and Technology, shall not disclose voluntarily provided safety-related information if that information is not directly related to the building failure being investigated and the Director finds that the disclosure of the information would inhibit the voluntary provision of that type of information.

(d) PUBLIC SAFETY INFORMATION.—A Team and the National Institute of Standards and Technology shall not publicly release any information it receives in the course of an investigation under this Act if the Director finds that the disclosure of that information might jeopardize public safety.

Section 7 of the National Bureau of Standards Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1986 (15 U.S.C. 281a) is amended by inserting “, or from an investigation under the National Construction Safety Team Act,” after “from such investigation”.

SEC. 14. CONSTRUCTION.

Nothing in this Act shall be construed to confer any authority on the National Institute of Standards and Technology to require the adoption of building standards, codes, or practices.

SEC. 15. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The National Institute of Standards and Technology is authorized to use funds otherwise authorized by law to carry out this Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEINER) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BOEHLERT. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on H.R. 4687.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, I am honored to bring this bill back to the House so we can pass it and send it on to the President for his signature. Last week the Members of the House, like citizens throughout our Nation, set aside time to remember the events and heroes and victims of last September 11. We re-experienced the shock and horror of that day, and we gave thanks for our liberties and the way our Nation spontaneously came together to provide emergency, emotional and financial support to those people and places that needed it.

But that is not enough. Our responses to September 11 cannot be limited to sentiment. We have to learn from what happened that day, and apply those lessons. Most of the lessons, of course, relate to foreign policy and domestic security, and it is often difficult to discern exactly what those lessons ought to be once one goes beyond enhanced vigilance, but there are also lessons related to building safety, and at least the immediate lessons in that area are crystal clear.

The collapse of the Twin Towers, and especially the emergency response and evacuation procedures in response to the attack on the Towers, indicates that we need to know more about skyscraper safety. The government study that followed the collapse showed that we need to have better procedures in place to study building failures, from whatever cause, if we are going to save lives in the future.

The attack on the World Trade Center is, we hope, unique. But the collapse of those two seemingly immovable objects has lessons for a wide variety of buildings facing a wide variety of relatively common circumstances.

H.R. 4687, which I introduced along with the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEINER), will ensure that we are able to learn and apply those lessons, not only in the case of the World Trade Center, but in future cases as well.

The bill simply and precisely remedies each and every failing that hindered the investigation of the World Trade Center collapse. The bill gives clear responsibility and authority, including subpoena power, to the National Institute of Standards and Technology to use its longstanding expertise, and that of outside experts, to investigate failures of structures and evacuation procedures, and to make specific recommendations to prevent their recurrence. The bill ensures that NIST's response will be swift and thorough.

This bill has already passed the House overwhelmingly, and we have negotiated clarifying changes with the Senate. The bill is ready for the President, and it will be a fitting memorial to those who perished last year at this time.

Madam Speaker, I thank the families of those who died at the Trade Center, especially those who have formed the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, for all their hard work in helping to bring this measure to fruition. We are working together to ensure that no other families will ever have to experience their particular pain.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WEINER. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, I want to add a couple of points of explanation to what the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) has said.

First of all, it is clear that no one in this body, no one on the Committee on Science, no one could have anticipated that dreadful act, that shameful act of cowardice that led to the collapse of the World Trade Center. In fact, nothing that we do today should negate the fact that the way those buildings were built, with such strength and such great craftsmanship, they stood for over an hour, even after they were hit with the most horrific forces any building has had to withstand. What is the result, today over 25,000 families are together with their surviving member because they were able to get out alive. It was the largest urban rescue in history, and it would not have been possible had it not been for the fortitude of those buildings.

But we also would be remiss if we did not recognize that the investigation that ensued after the September 11 building collapse was a disaster. There was miscommunication between different agencies. There was infighting with agencies. To give Members an idea, 80 percent of the steel from those buildings was taken away and recycled before any expert could take a look at them to try to determine if there were flaws that could be avoided in the future.

The electrical switches that could have provided so many telltale signs for investigators were taken away. There were even fights over whether investigators had the right to see the blueprints to the building. In fact, the way I put it, it was a crime scene, and not only was there no smoking gun found, but there was no weapon found. In truth, there was not even a detective assigned to the case. That is what we are trying to address today.

I should point out this is not just idle Monday morning quarterbacking. There are real things that we will be able to learn from this investigation and others to come, although we all hope that this agency is never used. We could learn things that we learned already in the preliminary investigation of the World Trade Center, that perhaps having exit stairwells so close together makes it possible that they can all be knocked out through one horrific event, such as happened in Tower One where three of the stairwells were completely knocked out, preventing egress to the top.

We can learn something that hopefully we would have learned in the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, that we need to hard-wire repeaters into these buildings. Repeaters allow firefighters on the ground to talk to firefighters almost a quarter of a mile up without interference on the radio. The most haunting thing that came from so many of the revelations that we have seen since September 11 is that firefighters, the most heroic imaginable, were climbing the stairs up, not hearing the calls from their comrades below that it was time to evacuate. Mayday calls that should have been assigned to firefighters to get out were never heard by the firefighters because the hard-wiring in the building was not sufficient to install repeaters.

Finally, we may need to learn something about roof access to these buildings. Who knows what might have been possible. We know that hundreds of people perished that day because they went up to the roof seeking a way out. As a matter of fact, early on there were reports that some of the dispatchers who were getting the calls were advising people to do that, all of the things we may learn for future investigations.

But there is one other fact we must not forget, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) pointed it out, that this bill would not have happened, simply put, would not have happened had it not been for families of victims and interested Americans coming to us and saying in the midst of all of the difficult things that we have to do as a Congress and efforts to secure our homeland, let us not forget that we need to do an investigation about why those buildings came down.

Frankly, it was the impetus of the Skyscraper Safety Campaign that made this bill a reality. It would not have become a reality had the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) not taken it up, and not taken it up with such dignity and speed, and his staff had not been so proficient in doing it, including Mike Quear on our side of the aisle, Geoffrey Hockert and Lamar Robertson on my staff. Frankly, the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) has shown us the way to get this stuff done. Many of us are standing here after September 11 and wondering why so many of the obvious things are taking longer than we thought. Perhaps if the gentleman from New York (Chairman BOEHLERT) was the chairman of all of the committees, and I am not sure that I would wish that on the gentleman, but perhaps it would move quicker.

Secondly, it is undeniably a fact that if we did not have the NTSB as a model, this would have taken a lot longer. The NTSB has shown us the way in the way that they investigate airline crashes, the way they sequester information, and take control of a scene as if it were a crime scene. They always get their man. They have virtually 100 percent success rate of coming to conclusions about why planes crash. We use that as a model to help this bill.

Madam Speaker, I strongly urge the President to give this the attention it deserves by having a ceremony when he signs this bill. I thank Senator SCHUMER and Senator CLINTON for being so expeditious in their consideration. This is legislation that hopefully we will never see put into place. There should never again be, God willing, the type of catastrophic building collapse as we saw in New York on the morning of September 11; but if there is, we should learn from it. And, as importantly, we hope with this legislation we give the tools to investigators to learn everything possible to learn about the causes of the September 11 collapse.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Madam Speaker, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEINER) points out something very important. We get things done in this institution by working on a bipartisan basis. We get things done in this Congress by working on a bicameral basis. That is why we have succeeded in getting to this point.

Madam Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHAYS), someone who has been very instrumental in fashioning this bill and bringing us to the point where we are right now.

Mr. SHAYS. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEINER) for this legislation, for their perseverance, and for listening to their constituents and the people who suffered from September 11 who helped design this bill.

When we had the first hearing on H.R. 4687, the National Construction Safety Team Act, I thought, "what am I really going to learn." Two large airplanes filled with fuel crashed into two buildings, and the buildings came down; end of story.

Well, as soon as the hearing began, I learned there was so much more to the story. First, who was in charge. What happened to the evidence, not like it was a crime, this was a terrorist act, but what happened to the materials that would help us understand how these buildings collapsed and how it might have been prevented.

As others have pointed out, where the location of the stairs were. I have a constituent who spoke to her loved one, her husband, for almost an hour as he went to the top of the building, went down to the fire, tried to find a way to get out, asked for her help as she looked at the building on the cameras, on the TV, to see if she saw any opportunity. That was the last time she spoke with her husband, trying to help him deal with this catastrophe.

We have a good model in the NTSB. We know that we have the ability when there are airplane crashes to look at the NTSB and see what they do. They take control. They have subpoena power. They have the ability to look at every aspect of the disaster, the people involved, what they did, what they did not do, the materials involved, what happened. With this legislation, NIST has the same authority, with all the same powers. When there is a major catastrophe, when there is loss of life, they are going to step in.

I was particularly intrigued by the fact that not only were we talking about these two incredibly large buildings, but we are talking about a 40-story building that caught on fire and there was no way to put that fire out, no water, no ability to put it out, so it was allowed to burn for nearly 7 hours, this 40-story structure. Think of all that we could have learned about building material. Think what we will learn in the future and just think of how important it is for those who have lost loved ones to know that there is an organization like NIST that will take charge just like the NTSB takes charge in the disaster of an air flight. We are at war with terrorists. They are going to use conventional, biological, and possibly chemical weapons. Heaven forbid that they will someday have access to nuclear weapons and try to use them. We know that we cannot always prevent a disaster, but when there is one, we need to learn from it.

Again, I want to just thank both the chairman of the Committee on Science, who has brought science to the discovery of why things happen, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEINER) for his incredible help. I appreciate the work of both of them.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GRUCCI) who has been there right from the beginning, at every hearing, meeting with the skyscraper safety campaign committee, meeting with the professional staff, working very hard to produce the product that we are proud to present to the House today.

Mr. GRUCCI. Madam Speaker, I would first like to take a moment to thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEINER) for their steadfast leadership and my colleagues on the Committee on Science for working together on this incredibly important piece of legislation. The tragedy of September 11 was one that no one could ever predict or even fathom. The extent to which our Nation was affected may never be completely understood. America sat with fear and awe, our eyes captivated by the sight of these once great majestic towers, reduced to a pile of smoldering ruins. But as the hallowed ground of lower Manhattan is cleared of the rubble and America attempts to heal from the horror of September 11, we continue to work together to find what answers we can muster from this tragedy and ask the critically important questions to find out how these towers failed.

Madam Speaker, my congressional district lies just 45 miles from what is now known as Ground Zero. My constituents were some of the first responders, opening up their emergency rooms and volunteering their rescue services to help the mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters, friends and even strangers, all that were trapped in that rubble in the World Trade Center on the morning of September 11.

This legislation, the National Construction Safety Team Act, will give the National Institute of Standards and Technology clear authority and responsibility as well as the necessary legal tools to investigate building failures. Other Federal agencies, such as the National Transportation Safety Board, have the authority to obtain evidence and investigate transportation calamities. In the collapse at Ground Zero, there was no clear mandate to what Federal agency would lead an investigation into the building's failure. This confusion can never happen again.

H.R. 4687 clarifies the process and makes certain that NIST has the authority to study building collapses. It is crucial that we extend this authority to building engineers and protect all Americans from future danger or tragedy. I am proud to be an original cosponsor of this legislation and place my full support behind the bill. I urge my colleagues to join me once again in supporting final passage of this critical legislation before the close of the 107th Congress.

Mr. WEINER. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I just want to make one concluding thought. One of the things that has been suggested in some quarters, and we are having a great deal of discussion in New York about how to redevelop lower Manhattan is, "Well, maybe we shouldn't build big buildings anymore." I think this legislation is a recognition of just the opposite. Big buildings have always been, as E.B. White described it, built out of our desire to reach for the heavens. In New York City, frankly, we do not have big wide open spaces, so we are not going to build out to the sides. We are going to be building high-rise.

There is another absolute fact I can say going forward: We are always going to have firefighters who are going to run into those buildings to save people on the high floors. Those are two almost immutable facts of life in New York and probably in the United States of America.

This legislation is a sign that we are not retreating from that idea. What we are doing is trying to learn from our experiences, to try to make both the people who work in those buildings, firefighters and emergency workers who may someday, God forbid, have to rush into those buildings, make them both safer. But let no one see this legislation being passed and say, well, we are getting a little bit weak in the knees about whether or not we should be living up to our greatest ambitions as Americans and as New Yorkers. Neither one is true. In fact, this is recognition that we are going to be building big buildings, we are going to be making them safer, we are going to be making them such that emergency workers can get in and out of them with ease and make them, frankly, never terror-proof, they are never going to be earthquake-proof, they are never going to be bomb-proof, but we are going to try to learn the tragic lessons of September 11. That should be the legacy of those 2,801 people that were lost that day.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Our unending quest must be to fill gaps in our knowledge base. With this legislation, we are doing just that. This is a proud moment for the House. I want to thank particularly the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEINER) but also others who cannot be here today because of conflicts. The gentleman from New York (Mr. ISRAEL) was very helpful. The gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. MORELLA) was there right from the beginning and worked very hard.

I want to comment on the high degree of professionalism of the staff on the Committee on Science. On our side, Cameron Wilson and Diane Jones and Dr. John Mimikakis and our staff director David Goldston. But it was not just a Republican staff and a Republican bill or a Democrat staff and a Democrat bill. This is a bill for America developed by concerned Americans who want to protect us as much as humanly possible for the future.

Mrs. MORELLA. Madam Speaker, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 4687, The National Construction Safety Team Act of 2002. I want to thank Chairman BOEHLERT for his outstanding leadership on this legislation, and for helping to bring this important issue to our attention. This bill has been strongly supported here in Congress, and also by the Administration.

We are all imminently aware of the tremendous challenges America faced on September 11. In an effort to find answers to some of our questions, the Science Committee heard disturbing testimony about the investigations into the reasons for the catastrophic building failure at the World Trade Center. As a result of that testimony, we have learned that there was no federal agency with clear authority over the investigation. This bill helps remedy that problem by giving the construction safety teams and the National Institute of Standards and Technology comprehensive investigation authorities similar to those of the National Transportation Safety Board. We are firmly establishing who is in charge of future investigations with clear mandates for action, without impeding search and rescue operations. The legislation will allow the teams to carry out critical functions such as: accessing the site of a build disaster, accessing key building records and documents, and retrieving and preserving evidence. We have also learned through testimony that the public was often kept in the dark, leading to confusion and resentment among victims and families. This bill establishes clear lines of communication, ensuring that the public will be informed throughout the investigation, with regular briefings and public hearings.

Additionally, we are supporting much needed research by NIST into the technical causes of the World Trade Center collapse, and other fire safety issues, in an attempt to provide the necessary research for future building safety codes. NIST is the premier federal laboratory for research in building design and safety, and is uniquely positioned to fully understand the World Trade Center disaster and thereby prevent future collapses.

While I applaud my colleagues for their efforts on moving this important bill, I also caution them that our work may not be done. As the investigations continue, NIST may uncover more questions about the deficiencies of our building designs. They may also discover gaps in our knowledge. New studies and new facilities may be necessary to fill these voids, and thereby may require a new commitment from us. Passage of H.R. 4687 is a very important step toward greater knowledge and better understanding of the events that changed all our lives. I urge your support of this legislation.

Ms. JACKSON-LEE of Texas. Madam Speaker, I strongly support H.R. 4687, The National Construction Safety Team Act of 2002. I am pleased with the outcome of our work on the Science Committee in addressing in a timely fashion, a problem highlighted in the wake of the events of last 9/11. In just a year we already have before us a piece of legislation that will greatly enhance the safety of the next generation of buildings, and save many lives.

Every experience, no matter how horrific, presents an opportunity to learn. Many lives were lost last year, the two moments that jets crashed into the World Trade Center Buildings 1 and 2. However, much of the devastation occurred over the next hour, as people became trapped in the building, exposed to fire and smoke, and eventually as the buildings collapsed. Although, our first responders made heroic efforts, and did an excellent job at rising to the challenge of this unprecedented attack—there is always room for improvement. Also, although the World Trade Center was an architectural marvel, perhaps there were design changes that could have been incorporated that would have saved lives.

Even as the healing is taking place, we must look back carefully and objectively at the events that took place, and look forward to implementation plans which might prevent such catastrophic loss from occurring again.

The National Construction Safety Team Act gives responsibility to the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) to dispatch teams of experts within 48 hours after major building disasters. The team will determine the likely technical cause of building failures. They will also evaluate procedures used for evacuation and emergency responses. Then, the team will recommend specific changes to building codes, standards and practices, and to emergency response and evacuation procedures. The team will make regular briefings to the public during ongoing investigations, to keep the public apprised of developments. Implementation of the final recommendations will make our nation's buildings safer and people more secure.

The bill strikes an excellent balance between allowing the team to be efficient and effective—to access the site, subpoena evidence, etc.—and the need to stay out of the way of search and rescue attempts that may also be ongoing.

Obviously, the first implementation of this bill would be a comprehensive review of the World Trade Center collapse. NIST has already started its follow-on investigation, with $16 million transferred from FEMA. This bill (H.R. 4687) will provide NIST with the ability to subpoena data, if necessary, to augment its current investigation. The citizens of New York deserve such a deep and thoughtful approach.

But this bill is not only a "World Trade Center Bill." Teams will be organized and prepared to respond within 48 hours of any major building failure that involves significant loss of lives, or the danger of such loss. I hope that such a system could also help us learn from, and better prepare for natural disasters as we saw in Houston during Tropical Storm Allison in 2001. Flooding led to the destruction of thousands of homes and buildings, and the loss of 41 lives nationwide. Hospitals, such as that at Baylor College of Medicine, suffered millions of dollars in damages, setting research back years.

One young woman who died in Houston, Kristie Tautenhahn, was in a building that was rapidly flooding. A voice came over the intercom, informing employees that the underground garage was filling up with water, and people should go down and move their cars. Kristie, a 42-year old proofreader in a law firm got trapped in an elevator on her way down to the garage, and drowned soon after.

Tragic events, like the death of Ms. Tautenhahn or the flood damage of Baylor probably would not trigger the kind of investigations that this bill provides for. However, it seems that the work of investigative teams created by this bill, could provide valuable information which may bring about smarter building codes, to prevent such failures, and better strategies of getting the appropriate warnings and evacuation information to potential victims of disaster.

H.R. 4687 is a great strike toward a more comprehensive national strategy for predicting, preventing, and mitigating damage due to disasters of all sorts. It is a proactive, preemptive type strategy that could save lives and money. I am pleased with the Science Committee's leadership on such issues. It compliments well other legislation emerging from the Science Committee, such as the Inland Flooding Bill that I worked on with my colleague from North Carolina BOB ETHERIDGE, which will help predict and prevent damage from cyclone-related flooding. We are turning away from just putting out fires, and toward understanding our vulnerabilities, and trying prevention. It is the right way to go.

I urge my colleagues to support the National Construction Safety Team Act 2002.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Madam Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BIGGERT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. BOEHLERT) that the House suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendment to the bill, H.R. 4687.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 17, 2002.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, and under a previous order of the House, the following Members will be recognized for 5 minutes each.

RECORD INCREASE IN PUBLIC DEBT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. TAYLOR) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, last week the President of the United States went to Ohio and mentioned repeatedly that what this Congress needed was a budget. I agree. I wish he had included one more word in that, what this Congress needs is a "balanced" budget.

See, Mr. Speaker, last year this Congress, when there was still a Republican majority in the other body and a Republican majority in this body, gave the President his budget and gave the President his tax breaks. They passed both bodies by a fairly narrow margin, but they did indeed become law and the President signed them into law.

As a result of that budget, our Nation's debt has increased by $440,605,894,921 in the past 12 months. To put that into perspective, our Nation is now $6,210,481,675,956 in debt.

What is particularly disturbing about that is that as our President ponders sending the young men and women in uniform off to fight, most of whom are 23 years old or younger, I think it is particularly significant that in the lifetime of those soldiers and sailors who are 23 years of age or younger, our Nation's debt has increased by over $5 trillion. What is particularly bad about that is, just like any individual who has a credit card, as long as we owe that money, we have to pay interest on it. The single largest expenditure of this Nation is not welfare, it is not food stamps, it is not veterans' health care, it is not building highways, it is not defending the Nation. It is squandered on interest on the national debt. We squander $1 billion a day. That is 1,000 times 1,000 times 1,000 every day is squandered on the national debt.

Mr. Bush, I know that all of us are our fathers' sons. All of us are proud of our dads, and you should be particularly proud of your dad. After all, he was the President of the United States. One of the things your dad did not do well was controlling the deficit when he was President. As a matter of fact, the largest deficit in our Nation's history took place during the fiscal year of 1991, when your dad was President. In that year, our Nation borrowed $432 billion. That is 1,000 times 1,000 times 1,000 times 432 to make ends meet.

I regret to tell you, Mr. Bush, that you are on the way to breaking your dad's record; that in all probability, at the end of this year, you will have borrowed, with your budget passed through a Republican Senate and Republican House, more than that $432 billion. So as you go to Ohio and tell folks that we need a balanced budget, I would only ask as one of 435 Members of this House that you include the word "balanced" budget.

Why do you not use your incredible popularity to ask the American people to get their Congressmen to support a constitutional amendment to balance the budget, so that this generation does not burden the next generation with our bills? After all, no mom or dad would go buy a house and say, "I don't care what it costs, because I am going to stick my child with that bill when they hit 40 years of age, when they reach the maximum income years."

None of us would go out and buy a fancy car, and say, "By the way, bill it to my grandchildren, whether they are born or not."

That is precisely what this Nation has been doing, particularly for the last 23 years, when it borrowed $5 trillion.

On an aside, Mr. Bush, you made a very compelling case to the UN last Thursday, and I am in agreement; you have now convinced me that our Nation will be at war unless the Iraqis back down. If that is the case, then I must insist as a Member of Congress that the wise thing for our Nation to do would be to call up the Guard and Reserve. Over one-half of the force of the United States of America is in the Guard and Reserve.

If there is going to be a war, then I subscribe to former General and now Secretary of State Colin Powell's theory of the overwhelming use of force, and we cannot have the overwhelming use of force if the Guard and Reserve is not called up.

If we are going to do this, let us do this right. The best way to minimize American casualties is to use overwhelming force, and that has to include the calling up of the Guard and Reserves. If this is going to be a war, then it is going to be everybody's war, and the way you make it everyone's war is including the National Guard and the various branches of the Reserves in the effort.

I would also hope that this body has an opportunity to vote on it. But, prior to that vote, I would highly recommend that the Guard and Reserve be called up, because the Iraqis watch Cable News Network also, and I think as an American people, we should expect attacks on American soil through acts of terror from the minute that that vote is taken, and we should be prepared for that as a Nation. The only way to be prepared for that as a Nation is to have the Guard and Reserve called up.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All Members are reminded that their remarks in debate should be addressed to the Chair. It is not in order to direct remarks directly to the President of the United States.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I want to continue on the general thesis of the concern that many of us have on this side of the aisle, that we seemingly have forgotten about budgets and balanced budgets and we seem to not be willing to talk about the deficits that are now occurring. That is very alarming.

As you know, last year this body passed a budget, an economic game plan. There seems to be a great reluctance to change that plan, which means that we are now willingly going to be endorsing deficits as far as the eye can see.

We on this side on the Blue Dog Caucus have repeatedly offered to work in a bipartisan way with our friends on the other side of the aisle and with the administration to come up with a new budget plan. But there seems to be no desire whatsoever to do so.

We now are very concerned, because at the end of this month the few remaining budget rules that have worked fairly good over the most recent period of time when we did achieve a balanced budget, pay-go, simply saying if you are going to increase spending you have got to find some cut somewhere else, expire. If you are going to cut taxes, you have got to find somewhere else to pay for it. It has worked pretty good, when the spirit of this body was behind it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no willingness of the leadership of this House to pass these budget enforcement rules so that they might at least be enforced, and some would say so they can be ignored, which is basically what we have been doing in this body all year. The rules we have, we ignore them and we pass a rule over the objection of the minority.

The Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget makes a very compelling argument that we should stop blaming the other body for what they are not doing and just us do our job. It would seem that it would make a lot more sense to all of us in this body if we passed all 13 appropriation bills. Then we would have something to be concerned about, whether the Senate does or does not pass a budget.

But we seemingly are not going to be able to pass the 13 appropriation bills, but some of us seem perfectly willing to find somebody to blame. I was reminded a long time ago when you are pointing the finger of blame at someone else, there are always three pointing back at you; and we need to be reminded and we are going to take to the floor quite often over the next several days and remind everyone of the multitude of budget votes, lockbox votes that we voted in this body almost unanimously that no one was going to touch the Social Security surplus. We are. And as far as the eye can see, we are going to be doing it again.

Running up debt, we increased our Nation's debt by $450 billion in a vote last year. We are going to have to do it again early next year because, as the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. TAYLOR) pointed out, our public debt outstanding has now gone to $6.210 trillion. That is an increase of $440 billion, and I said increase because seemingly when you read the press and you read the rhetoric of what we are attempting to be told that it is not that bad, it is that bad. It is a serious problem, and it goes far beyond the war on terrorism.

CBO says the impact of September 11 represents only about 11 percent of the total deterioration of the surplus since last year, and now we are being told that we are going to possibly be in another war, that the estimated cost now ranges somewhere between 100 and $200 billion. We should spend some time, instead of doing what we seem to be doing here this week, very few votes of substance, very few discussions, no bills being proposed to put the pay-go rules and putting some budget discipline back into our budget, no one talking about a budget, no one talking about a new budget, which means that somebody ought to come on this floor and defend the budget that we are now under.

Come on this floor and honestly talk about the fact that we have borrowed in the last 12 months $440 billion; $440 billion that we have borrowed. We owe the Social Security trust fund $1.3 trillion. We owe Medicare $263 billion. We owe the military retirement fund $164 billion. We owe the civil service retirement and disability fund $535 billion, and we are increasing that. I do not think that is the kind of a budget confidence vote that the markets are looking at or that anyone is looking at today.

I would conclude my remarks by saying Congress and the President need to come up with a new budget and economic game plan to deal with the changes in our budgetary outlook and deal with the new circumstances facing this country. To do otherwise is fiscally irresponsible.

IMPLEMENTING A LONG-TERM BUDGET PLAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DUNCAN). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BOYD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Speaker, I want to follow up on the themes that were developed by the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. TAYLOR) and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM).

Mr. Speaker, we are less than 2 weeks away from the end of the fiscal year, and it is rapidly becoming very clear that the leadership of the House, this House of Representatives, has painted itself into a corner. How do we implement a responsible long-term budget plan? How do we extend the current budget enforcement rules that help control discretionary spending and require offsets for mandatory spending and new tax cuts? These budget enforcement rules are set to expire on October 1. How do we enact the 13 annual appropriations bills in regular order?

All of these questions must be answered by the House leadership if we are going to stem the flow of red ink and put the Federal budget back on the path to balance. Unfortunately, the only solution that the House leadership seems to have is to pretend that these deadlines do not exist. This is not a workable solution.

The Blue Dog Coalition has offered to work with the Republican leadership to develop bipartisan answers to these questions by establishing a viable long-term budget, extending the budget enforcement rules to control both the tax side and the spending side of the Federal budget, and to develop a road map to enact the appropriations bills in a fiscally responsible manner. We have offered in the past to work with the leadership, and we do that again this week.

First, Congress and the President need to make tough choices to address the changes in the budget outlook. The President has an obligation to lead in proposing a game plan to deal with the changed circumstances and to put the budget back on a path to balance without using the Social Security surplus. Right now under the President's budget, we will be borrowing from the Social Security trust fund until at least 2009. Given that the House of Representatives has voted seven times since I have been in this House in 5½ years to protect the Social Security trust fund by placing it in a lockbox, it is simply unacceptable to borrow the Social Security trust fund for the next 8 years to operate the general revenue side of the government. This is why we must sit down in a bipartisan manner and develop realistic tax and spending levels that will put us back on the glide path to a balanced budget.

Next, we must extend the budget caps which are set to expire, the provisions of the Budget Enforcement Act of 1990, which were adopted on a bipartisan basis expire, as I said earlier, on October 1. Unless we renew our budget discipline, Congress will continue to find ways to pass more legislation that puts still more red ink on the national ledger. Even Alan Greenspan and the Concord Coalition agree that steps must be taken to answer these questions in such a way that we balance the budget. Chairman Greenspan stated, and I quote, "Failing to preserve (budget enforcement rules) would be a grave mistake . . ." The Concord Coalition warned that allowing budget enforcement rules to expire is "an open invitation to fiscal chaos."

Finally, we must work together to develop a bipartisan proposal to finish the 13 appropriations bills.

Mr. Speaker, our fiscal year ends in about 2 weeks. Over the past few years, when Congress and the President have not been able to finish the 13 appropriations bills, spending has far exceeded the levels that were recommended in the budget resolution earlier in the year. This year, we have not sent one of the 13, not one of the 13 appropriations bills to the President for his signature. As a matter of fact, the House, the House of Representatives has passed only three of the 13 regular appropriations bills off of the House floor; and again, the fiscal year ends in 2 weeks. There have been none that have been voted on on this House floor, or none scheduled since Labor Day, since we returned to our work from the August recess.

Mr. Speaker, it is vital, if we are going to put the budget back on the path to a balanced budget, that we work together to control the discretionary spending on these 13 bills. Working together in a bipartisan basis, we can balance the budget, just like we did in the Balanced Budget Act of 1997. This is why I urge and call upon the President and the Republican congressional leadership to work with us to develop bipartisan proposals that will ensure that we have a fiscally responsible government.

SUPPORT H.R. 3612, THE MEDICAID COMMUNITY-BASED ATTENDANT SERVICES AND SUPPORTS ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to request support for H.R. 3612, the Medicaid Community-based Attendant Services and Supports Act, also known as MiCASSA. This bill will enable our older Americans and citizens with disabilities who qualify for long-term care services under the Medicaid program to receive the non-institutional community support service options they are entitled to under the Americans With Disabilities Act.

The Americans With Disabilities Act, signed into law by President Bush in 1990, ushered in a new era of promise for a segment of our population whose talents and rights as American citizens have been too long ignored. It promised a new social compact to end the paternalistic patterns of the past that took away our rights if we become disabled. It says that people with disabilities have the right to be active participants integrated into the everyday life of society. This premise, however, cannot become a reality until we roll up our sleeves and do the work necessary to eliminate the barriers that still hinder its full implementation.

In its 1999 Olmstead ruling, the Supreme Court said that States violate the Americans With Disabilities Act when they unnecessarily put people with disabilities in institutions. The problem is that our Federal-State Medicaid program has not been updated and has a built-in bias that results in the unnecessary isolation and segregation of many of our senior citizens and younger adults in institutions.

Too often, decisions relating to the provision of long-term services and supports are influenced by what is reimbursable under Federal and State Medicaid policy rather than by what individuals need and deserve. Research has revealed a significant bias in the Medicaid program towards reimbursing services provided in institutions over services provided in home and community settings. The only option currently guaranteed by Federal law in every State is nursing home care. Other options have existed for decades, but their spread has been fiscally choked off by the fact that 75 percent of our long-term care dollars go into institutional settings, in spite of the fact that studies show that many people do better in home and community settings.

Only 27 States have adopted the benefit option of providing personal care services under the Medicaid program. Although every State has chosen to provide certain services under home and community-based waivers, these services are unevenly distributed, have long waiting lists, and reach just a small percentage of eligible individuals.

Governor Howard Dean is a physician and Vermont's Chief Executive. He recently testified on Capitol Hill on behalf of the National Governors Association and asked Congress to give the States the tools they need to grow home and community-based service. In his testimony he said, "We can provide a higher quality of life by avoiding institutional services whenever possible. Some people insist we will need more nursing homes. They are wrong. Baby boomers today are looking for alternatives for their parents. We can't afford to protect the status quo. We need to listen to people and act boldly to develop those services they want and are, in fact, affordable."

So I ask, Mr. Speaker, all Members of this honorable body to be in support of services for individuals in home-based settings so that they too can realize the assurance of living as they choose and as they see fit. Support MiCASSA.

DOMESTIC POLICY AND INTERNATIONAL POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OSBORNE). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. MCINNIS) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the majority leader.

Mr. MCINNIS. Mr. Speaker, there are two subjects that I want to address this evening, and both are of critical importance to us. One involves domestic policy, and one of them involves international policy. Obviously, we can guess what the international policy would be: dealing with Iraq, dealing with our war on terror, dealing with the United Nations resolutions. But before I get into the international discussion that I want to have this evening with my colleagues, I want to discuss the domestic situation involving a subject a long ways away from the al Qaeda or from Afghanistan or from Iraq or from the United Nations resolutions. I want to talk for a few minutes about the national forests, especially the national forests on public lands.

Now, public lands are lands that are owned by the government. It could be a local government, it could be a State government, or it could be Federal Government. The largest owner of land in the United States obviously is the United States Federal Government. They own millions and millions and millions of acres of land in this country.

Now, when this country was first developed, our population was primarily on the east coast, and the government wanted to grow our big country. As our country began to make land acquisitions, for example, the Louisiana Purchase and things like that, they knew that in order to expand the country, we not only had to buy the land, but we had to occupy the land. We had to put people on the land.

We had to have the people willing to protect the land. The best way to do that was not to give them a deed that said, Here is some land out in the West. Obviously, to grow our country we needed to move it west. We needed to move the population west. West in the early days was West Virginia. People did not have to go very far west to find out that they were in wilderness areas.

To do this, the Federal Government knew that they could not just give a piece of paper that said someone owned a piece of property out in the State of Kansas or Missouri or up in the Colorado mountains. They knew they could not do just that.

Today, it is a little different. Today, one can actually have a piece of property in Colorado, and one can live in Florida, and their rights as a private property owner are respected. They do not have to worry about squatters or about people taking over their land when they were not there.

But in the early days of the country, that was not true. That is not what the situation was. In the early days, one had to possess or be on the property; and frankly, they had to have a six-shooter strapped to their sides. That, in fact, is where the saying "possession is nine-tenths of the law," that is where that saying came from; that is, that to hold that land, they needed to go out there and be on it.

The government wanted to expand. They had to figure out, how do we encourage people to leave the comforts of the East Coast? How do we encourage our population on the East Coast to move inward, to move west? How do we do this?

They came up with an idea. In the Revolutionary War, our government bribed the soldiers, the British soldiers. We bribed the soldiers in such a way that we offered them free land, free land if they would defect from the British troops and join the American troops in our efforts against the Brits.

So they decided to follow the same type of philosophy or the same strategy. That strategy is to offer free land to people if they would go out and settle on the new land that the government had acquired. If they would agree to do that, the government would give them land. That is where we had the act like the Homestead Act take place, where the government would give people, if they would go out and work the land for a period of time, 3 to 5 years, they would give 160 acres or 320 acres.

People bought into that concept. It really did begin the movement of taking this country to the West, the opportunity of free land. Then we combine that with other things that we began to do in the mid-1860s, for example, the continental railroad, the completion of the continental railroad; and the ability for a merchant to be able to ship merchandise from one store that he or she owned to another store he or she owned; and time zones in the country. There were a lot of things that were changing with the Industrial Revolution. We saw this huge movement to the West. We were able to possess the lands that the United States as a government purchased; so we had that possession. That possession is nine-tenths of the law. We were able to accomplish that.

But what happened was when these settlers hit the Rocky Mountains, when they hit the western part of the United States, which is different than the eastern part of the United States geographically and in water measurements, because, for example, in the East in a typical year, and this is not a typical year, but in a typical year when our Nation is not suffering from a drought, we have lots of water in the East. In fact, the situation in the East usually is, how do we get rid of the water, or shove it over on our neighbor's property?

In the West, it is a very arid region. It is the arid region of the country. In fact, almost half the country has about 14 percent of the water. That is the West: the Rocky Mountains, the Utahs, the Nevadas, the Californias; and Montana, Wyoming, States like that. This is a very arid place.

What happened when our country was attempting to get people to possess that land? They would not do it, because 160 acres was not enough. See, even in eastern Colorado, and, now, my district consists of the mountains of western Colorado, but in eastern Colorado, with 160 acres in a typical year one could support a family in those early days. But once one hits the mountains of Colorado or hit western Colorado, or the Rocky Mountains in Montana, or the mountain ranges in New Mexico or places like that, 160 acres would not even feed a cow; would not even feed a cow. So they had to come up with something different.

What was happening was people were moving to the West, going to the West; but as soon as they hit those Rocky Mountain regions, as soon as they hit the arid areas, they went around them. They went around to the fertile valleys in the State of California, or they went to other places; or settled out in Nebraska or Kansas or Missouri or Arkansas, places like that where the land was much more fertile, the water was much more plentiful.

So word got back to Washington: Look, this strategy of ours, this strategy of giving land for people to possess so we have people on the land to grow our Nation, our great Nation, is working fine except when we hit the arid States of the West.

Somebody said, well, what shall we do? Shall we give them a proportionate amount of land, like 3,000 acres, which would be the equivalent of, say, 160 acres as far as what one could grow on it? It is proportionate to what one could grow on it. The answer was, Wow, we have gotten a lot of political heat here in Washington, D.C. simply because we gave so much land to the railroads.

As we know, there were a lot of robber barons. It sounds kind of familiar with some of the times we are facing right now. There was a lot of political heat because of the robber barons and the railroads, so the decision was very consciously made: Do not give them ownership of the land, these people, but let them use the land, to avoid the political heat. Let us go ahead and keep the property in the government's name, although originally all along it was intended to go to private hands; but to avoid the political heat, let us go ahead and keep the title to the land, and let the people use the land.

That was the birth of a concept called multiple use, many uses. That is where the concept of multiple use on Federal lands was conceived. When I grew up, for example, and I guess this is the best way to define multiple use, when I grew up and people went to the Federal lands, which in my district, there are probably 120 communities in my district, and actually, geographically, my district is larger than the State of Florida, but in my district, the Federal lands encircle every community except one. So of the approximately 120 communities in my district, 119 of them are completely circled by this land owned by the government.

Now, up until about the 1970s it was not a problem, because the land, under this concept of multiple use, was utilized and best described by a sign when one entered the forest that said, for example, "Welcome to the White River National Forest, a land of many uses." It was a land of many uses.

Well, it was not long before we had people in the East, while they were the beneficiaries of private land, and if we take a look at a map of the United States of America, we will find it very interesting. I know it is hard to see my pen here, but let me see if I can demonstrate quickly the differences between private ownership and government ownership as it relates to the United States and the geography of our country.

Now, obviously, Mr. Speaker, I am not an artist, so I am not trying to be an artist. I will just do a basic form, give or take, of the United States. My pen, unfortunately, is not working very well. Here is the eastern United States. Here is New York, Florida, places like that.

Basically, where my point is right here, right where I cross right here on the chart, to my left here, in the western United States, there are vast amounts of public land. That is where the majority, the great majority of the public land in the United States is located, in the western part of this country.

In the eastern part of the country we have a couple of large holdings, not huge, but large holdings of Federal land. We have the Everglades down in Florida, we have the Appalachians, and we have a little up here in the Northeast. Other than that, if we were to apply the color red to this poster board I have here, and this were the western United States, it would be almost all red. On the eastern side we would see little blotches of red, but very, very little of red in proportion to the West.

So the problem that happens is that we have a lot of people in the eastern United States that have very little experience with public lands. Their lands are owned by their neighbors, or they own the lands; they are not owned by the Federal Government. If we go to Pennsylvania or out to Missouri or some of these States, or even eastern Colorado, and when we have a planning and zoning meeting, that planning and zoning meeting is held at the local county courthouse or the local city hall. When we go to the West where the land is still owned by the government, those meetings are held in Washington, D.C. That is who does the planning and zoning out there for those Federal lands.

So it has always been a little pet peeve with those of us in the West that people in the East, with all due respect, have very little experience with public lands. They do not have the water issues that we do in the West, but they like to tell us in the West what is best for us in the West.

That is what happened many years ago in regard to our forests. Keep in mind that the majority of the forests in the eastern United States are privately owned. Whether we go down to the Carolinas, if we go to Florida, places like that, Minnesota, these forests are owned privately, the big majority of them.

In the West, our forests are primarily on public lands; so what we see, what we tend to see, is private forests usually produce better, and private forests generally are managed better. Why is that? Because in the West we have many, many different hands and fingers in the management of it because it is public lands.

Now, I think with public lands we have a pretty high fiduciary duty to manage those public lands, and we have to take care of those lands, because they do belong to all of us; although I think some precedent should be given to people who have to survive and live on those lands, that are completely surrounded by those lands, that depend for their water from those lands, that depend on their highways being able to come across those lands, that depend upon the power lines and the cellular phone towers. I could go on and on about how dependent in the West we are on public lands, a dependency not recognized nor necessitated in the East.

What happened? In the West we began to suffer, and actually not just in the West but throughout this country we have suffered massive forest fires. In the 1930s, society did not really accept fires as a natural course of a forest collapsing itself, so we decided that because the fires were such a threat to the human population and to wildlife populations and to watersheds and so on, that we would begin a very aggressive effort to fight the forest fires. Instead of letting them burn, we would fight them.

In the early days, around the turn of the century, we would have between 40 and 50 million acres a year on fire, 40 to 50 million acres a year that were on fire. What happened as a result of very effective work, frankly, by the American people and the Forest Service and the different fire agencies, we were able to restrain or restrict those fires from 30 or 40 or 50 million acres a year to 2 or 3 million acres a year, maybe 4 million acres a year, because we became very efficient with public relations: Smokey, the bear: Be careful, put your campfire out completely, pour water on it, et cetera, et cetera.

What happened through the evolution of time, a very short evolution of time, through the last 3 or 4 decades or so, man became very good at controlling fire. Unfortunately, we begin to see these forests, forests that would have, say, 20 trees per acre, all of a sudden begin to get 30 trees per acre, which was not the natural course of that acreage; then, pretty soon, 30 or 40 or 50 trees per acre.

Now, many of those acres out there that nature had always had by economics and balances, as nature does it, instead of having maybe 20 or 30 or 40 trees per acre, we now have 600 or 700 or 800 trees per acre. It has become a tinderbox. It has become gunpowder.

What has happened is that we had some terrible abuses by lumber companies in the '30s and '40s and '50s and '60s. These lumber companies would go in and they would use the concept of clear-cutting, where they cut everything in sight. They would leave a mess behind. They did not take into consideration the watersheds.

Frankly, there were a lot of scientific things that they did not know at that time that we know today that did a lot of harm back then when they carried out those policies of cutting lumber in those forests.

So thank goodness we begin to recognize some of that. We begin to get a tighter control, especially on public forests; because, after all, those do belong to the people. We begin to get a tighter grip on what was going on out there. We begin to apply more science to our forests. We had some very wholesome environmental movements to help us protect those forests.

But as is typical in our country, we wait for something to get to a crisis, which is exactly what happened on many of our forests, one, through our own forest management policies, and, two, through really unmonitored forest timbering, taking the lumber out of the forest, unmonitored. That is the extreme.

We realize and we see the damage that has happened. And as is a typical government response, it overresponds. So we come over here and at first solid environmental organizations came forward and conscientious conservatives came in and said, We need to conserve. We need to have more conservation in this area. We need to use better policies, and we were in hopes that we could bring that into balance.

But what has happened over the last 15 years in large part is as a result of radical environmental organizations, and not all environmental organizations are radical and I am not professing that up here. But I am telling you the Earth First, the Wilderness Society, the National Sierra Club, they operate on the Earth First strategy, and that is take the radical approach. And the approach that they have used in these public forests, primarily in the West, is preventing us, preventing us from going in and doing carefully monitored thinning and treating of these forests. You have got to manage these forests and we are not being allowed to do it. Lawsuit after lawsuit after lawsuit. Litigation for 3, 4, 5, 6 years into the future in order for you to go in and treat under a carefully monitored program, under the direction of the forest scientists, under the science of the forest, to go in and treat this forest.

What happens? Well, over time these forests get more and more trees per acre, and pretty soon some of those trees begin the national evolution. They die off and they fall on the forest floor. And pretty soon the forest floor begins to build up what we call fuel, dead leaves, dead trees. They are not being cleaned out. They are not being cleaned naturally as they were 100 years ago by fire. Instead, they are being controlled by, one, by controlled fire. We are learning more about that as we go on. And, two, we have organizations out there that would like to, every time you talk about going and treating a forest, they like to spin it, they like to spin it into lumber. You are helping some big lumber company. You will clear-cut. You will cut all of the big trees out of there.

It is a bunch of hype. It is a bunch of spin. And, unfortunately, they are so good with public relations, they spend so much money on advertising and commercials on TV, it is easy for them to convince the public that you should have hands-off on the forest or that the only place you should go and look at the forests is where it abuts up against the home.

They completely ignore watersheds. What are watersheds? In the mountains, for example, the water for a community usually is many, many miles away from that community; and it is up on the top of the mountain or side of the mountain and it is called the watershed, where the waters accumulate from the high snows.

My district is the highest elevation on the continent. So up at high altitudes of 10, 12, 13, 14,000 feet we have accumulation of water, watersheds, and those watersheds make their way down the mountains into the communities. We need to manage these forests. We need to protect those watersheds. And what has happened is over the years, in part, not totally, because the drought was a major contributing factor to the major forest fires we had this year; but in part we had people whose sole intent was to obstruct the process of the science of the forest. And once again today we are seeing it happen over again.

This summer has been a devastating summer in regards to forest fires. Take a look at the State of Oregon. How many hundreds of thousands of acres in the largest fire in that State's history. Take a look at the State of Arizona, hundreds of thousands of acres on fire in the largest fire in the history of that State. Take a look at my own home State, the State of Colorado, the Haymen fire, hundreds of thousands of acres in that State, in the State of Colorado, the largest fire in its history.

We have had massive fires this year. You cannot allow a forest, whether it is right next to what is called the urban interface, which means right next to the communities, whether it is right next to the communities or whether it is deep into the forests, you cannot allow those forests to accumulate the kind of growth that they have accumulated. You have got to manage those forests. And just by common sense we cannot let fire run wild. We still have to control fire. Controlled fires are one of the tools that we can help to treat and thin forests, but it is by no means the only tool, and it is by no means a major tool. Because, frankly, one out of every 20 controlled fires we have we lose control of them. That is what happened down in Mexico. That is what happened in the great Yellowstone fire a few years ago. We lost control of a controlled burn.

We have to go in there and manage these forests. The best people to manage those forests are not the public relations or political strategists for Earth First, the Wilderness Society and the National Sierra Club. Those are not the people that should be managing our forests. Nor should the Congressmen be managing our forests.

The people that ought to manage our forests are the people who are educated about forest science from some of the best universities in the country. Colorado State University, for example. From the people who have their hands in the forest soil every day of the week. From the experts on forest policy, on trees, how to grow trees, what is the proper amount of balance in that ecosystem that we have out there. Those are the people whose opinions should primarily drive forest fire policy and forest health policy in this country.

Now, I am chairman of the Subcommittee on Forests and Forest Health of the Committee on Resources, and that committee has oversight responsibility on all the forests in the Nation. And I am telling you, under my direction on that committee, our committee is determined to try and get management of the forests back to the scientists of the forests. But it is no easy task. I can tell you that the Wilderness Society, the National Sierra Club and their cohorts, the Earth First and some of these other organizations, they do not want to give up that territory. They have enjoyed the power of being able to control the management of America's forests through emotional arguments, through political, strategized, public relations campaigns; and you can pick up and see advertisements about it; and what has happened, I will tell you that some of the people in some of these organizations are well intended. But what we are running into right now is obstructionism. The radical organizations are trying to litigate, paralysis by analysis, and every time that you talk about the necessity to go into a forest and help thin it out for the forest's health, to help prevent fires, and whether there is a fire or not, just for the health of the forest in general because the scientists say that is the thing to do, do you know what happens? Right away we get some of the radical organizations, many of which do not even live near that forest, start filing actions and appeals in the courtroom. Our litigation today runs 3 to 5 to 10 years on some of these treatment projects.

Now, I have proposed a bill and it is a bill with bipartisan support. It is a bill that we have bipartisan working groups on. It is the most promising bill we have in the U.S. House of Representatives for a bipartisan compromise to help us go in and treat these forests. And guess what happens? We have not even got off first base. We have just come up with the idea, hey, let us stay within the environmental laws but let us stop this paralysis by analysis. Let us stop these organizations, from Earth First, for example, or the Wilderness Society from being able to litigate this from here as far as time can see, from one court to the next court to the next court. Let us put aside the spin that every time we want to clean out a forest that there must be some under-the-table deal with some lumber company out there.

What we are attempting to do with our bill to keep the environmental regulations that we have, keep public input, this is the forest of the public and the input of the public is absolutely crucial; but the public input should not go on and on and on. At some point you must make a decision. At some point we need to move on these forests.

Right now we have 175 million acres of forest property; 175 million acres that has not been treated; 75 million acres of that property is ready to explode, especially when we have a summer like the summer we just got through with serious droughts in many of these States and we saw what happened. Just a simple cigarette in Durango, Colorado, a simple cigarette that was thrown out a window blew up a fire that burned tens and tens and tens of thousands of acres, destroyed homes. And after it destroyed the homes, it brings the mudslides that destroy more homes.

Some of this can be prevented through proper management of our forests; and not only just the fires, our wildlife needs proper management in the forests. Good wildlife habitat has meadows in it. You have better wildlife habitat on an average piece of land, let us say an average acre of land, you have better wildlife habitat, better plant habitat, better habitat for the entire ecosystem all around if you just have 20 or 30 trees per acre instead of 4, 5, 600 trees per acre, where the sun cannot get in; where if there is a fire it goes from canopy to canopy; where it burns so intense that it sterilizes the soil.

We are not just talking about forest fires. We are talking about wildlife. We are talking about forest fires. We are talking about the plants and the other things that are important for the whole system to balance out there. But we are having a very difficult time being able to let the scientists come back in and manage the forests. And in large part it is because of a very aggressive political campaign which involves buying advertising in newspaper, radio ads and so on by different organizations. I think Earth First is in there. The Wilderness Society is in there. Of course, the National Sierra Club is in there. Greenpeace, some of these organizations, they are doing everything they can to make sure that we do not bring science into the forests.

That is not what has happened here on the House floor. That is not what is happening here with my colleagues.

My colleagues on both sides of the aisle have finally said, Look, enough is enough. We have got to do something about the management of this forest. I have got people like the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DEFAZIO), a very driven, very focused and very recognized environmentalist in the United States Congress. I have got the gentleman from California (Mr. GEORGE MILLER). He and I have clashed from the entire time I have been up here. He is very ardent on his issues on the environment, a very strong proponent of the environment. I have the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WALDEN), from the logging areas up in Oregon, who is a very strong proponent of the environment. Lumber is an important industry up in his district. He understands it. I have got myself. I have got other Members, Democrat and Republican, who have come together to try and structure a bill that keeps us within the environmental laws, that gives us the protection of environmental laws, that gives us public input, but allows this process to go forward. It stops paralysis by analysis. It does not allow these decisions to be made simply because you are able to stall it out through litigation, because some wealthy organization can file lawsuit after lawsuit after lawsuit after lawsuit.

And many of the mechanical treatment projects, about half the mechanical treatment projects we had lately, half of them were appealed. Half of them get into this paralysis by analysis. Now, not all of them were appealed by environmental organizations, and that is to their credit. And not all environmental organizations are being obstructionists in regards to what we are trying to do. We have some moderate, good, level-headed people out there that want something done with the forests.

So when I address the group, I am really addressing the most radical segment of an environmental community. And I am begging that segment, we have called them on the phone. We have begged them to come to the table; not to come to the table to fight, not to come to the table carrying protest signs, not to come to the table threatening more litigation; to come to the table just like we did with the Great Sand Dunes in my bill in Colorado; like we did with the Spanish Peaks, my bill in Colorado; like we did with the Black Canyon Park, the Campbell bill in Colorado. We were able to get local people, local environmental communities together and we were able to customize. And that is what this bill does.

This allows our local environmental communities to come together with our local timber industries' representatives, for example, or the people that recreate or the wildlife experts. The wildlife people have a big opinion here because, as I said earlier, a healthy forest is very, very important for good healthy wildlife.

This bill will allow decisions to be made with public input, with judicial input. We just do not allow it to go on forever and ever and ever. This bill has been endorsed by newspapers as a reasonable approach.

What are we seeing? We are seeing the national organizations, primarily located in Washington, D.C., or primarily located outside the public lands, pooling large sums of money to run commercials. That is how threatened they are by the fact that science might come back to the forest, to run commercials by full-page newspaper advertising, talking about how bad this bill is; and they have never even seen the bill, to the best of my knowledge.

My point here tonight is we have got forests that are in real trouble. We have got wildlife out there that is in real trouble. We have an environment out there that is in real trouble, and a lot of it is because of the fact that we are not allowing the people who know best, our forest scientists, our wildlife experts, our water and aquatic life experts, we are not allowing them to manage the forest based on science. Instead, we are seeing the forests managed by litigation that stalls and stalls and stalls and by radical environmental organizations that fund political campaigns as if they are running somebody for office, running public relation campaigns which, by the way, they cannot put as newspaper articles because newspaper articles have to be at least a little bit factually correct. Their newspaper advertisements do not have to be. So they run it as paid advertisements throughout the public lands area.

Our young people, it is amazing, in our schools are not being given the education they need to understand that the science of the forest is a very complicated issue; and we need to let the scientists do it, not the elected office people, although they should set the policy, with input from the people that elect them, with input from the public, and we should not let these forests be run by Earth First.

I do not think Earth First or Greenpeace or the Wilderness Society or the National Sierra Club, and the National Sierra Club up until this summer's firefighting and the same with the Wilderness Society were not proponents of going in and treating a forest and thinning out. Now all of the sudden they have changed their leaf, and they are in favor of it, but only as it faces the city, as if none of these problems with wildlife, too many trees per acre, too much foliage or other problems occur anywhere but on the front of the forest. It does not occur in the middle of the forest, on our watersheds and so on, according to some of these people.

My committee is bound and determined to come up with a fair, common-sense policy. It is not our intent to shortcut anybody from public input. It is not the intent to do anything except allow the forest service experts, the wildlife experts and so on to get their opportunity to come in and manage the forests as they ought to be managed.

These forests are absolutely critical for the health of this country; and they are absolutely, they are eminently important for those of us who live out in the forests, who are completely surrounded by the forests, who are completely surrounded by public lands. We want good public land policy; and we want the people who live in those public lands, regardless of what side of the issue they are on, we want people who live within the borders of those public lands to have input as to what goes on with those public lands.

It is my intent to continue to pursue on a bipartisan basis, which I think is very important, and I intend to pursue in good faith discussions with people such as the gentleman from California (Mr. GEORGE MILLER), the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DEFAZIO), the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WALDEN), and a number of others out here, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GOODLATTE), to pursue good sound forest health policies. That is our goal and it is our target.

Let me shift gears very quickly and spend my remaining time talking about an issue far afield from forest health and forest management. I want to speak this evening about the situation with President Bush and Iraq.

I have a couple of posters I would like to start the conversation out with. This is a quote to my left here, and I would like my colleagues to read along with me. This is from President Bill Clinton. This quote is 4 or 5 years ago. This is what Bill Clinton said about Saddam Hussein. What if Saddam Hussein fails to comply, they are talking about inspections, and the disarmament, to disarm the weapons that we know Saddam Hussein is building, has or soon will be in the possession of, so what if Saddam Hussein fails to comply, and we fail to act, or we take some ambiguous third route?

Keep in mind what the former President is saying here, if we fail to act or if we take an ambiguous third route. What he means by "ambiguous third route" is that Saddam Hussein comes out and puts some type of condition on inspections or tries to come up with some type of alternative other than inspections that would allow him to hide the weapons or would allow him to develop the weapons, without intrusion by the rest of the world or if we take some ambiguous third route, which gives him yet more opportunities to develop his program of weapons of mass destruction, and continue to press for the release of the sanctions and continue to ignore the solemn commitments that he made. Solemn commitments that he, Saddam Hussein, made and I am going to go through those commitments with my colleagues. Well, he, speaking about Saddam Hussein, will conclude that the international community has lost its will.

He will then conclude, here in the red, he will then conclude that he can go right on and do more to rebuild an arsenal of devastating destruction.

Let us take a look. As my colleagues remember, Iraq is the country that invaded, without cause, without cause, without retribution, invaded a smaller country, the country of Kuwait in the early 1990s. In the process of that invasion, they caused massive, massive human fatalities. They killed thousands and thousands, tens of thousands of Kuwaitis, men, women and children. They killed without discrimination.

It was only because of the United States of America and the coalition that it built with its European partners, and their partners throughout the world which also included, frankly, some cooperation from Russia and cooperation from China on the U.N. Security Council and so on. The rest of the world decided through a coalition led by the United States that they would not allow this to stand, that Saddam Hussein would not be allowed to ravage and savagely go into a small country, devastate its population, destroy its economy and occupy its lands. So we did Desert Storm. We led the fight.

We bent back and we liberated Kuwait. Iraq, by the way, their famous Right Guard or whatever, their fighting force, their supreme fighting force, they ran. This huge powerful war machine of Iraq collapsed within days to the fire power and to the strength of the United States of America and to the world coalition that followed.

Iraq made certain promises. Specifically, Iraq through Saddam Hussein, he made them, he made commitments to the United Nations. He made commitments to the rest of the world, and he promised to live with those commitments as long as his country existed. He has broken the commitments that he made, and the commitments that he made he broke 16 times, at least 16 times.

He kicked out the inspectors and then he went out and solicited by saying that his people were starving to death. By the way, he diverted money, instead of going to the people, his people, he put the money into his palaces. He has 14 massive palaces, like 14 Pepsi centers. That is how big these palaces are. They are great big stadium-types of homes. He put the money into that and the military, and he allowed his people to starve, and he tried to put a guilt feeling, a guilt complex on the rest of the world, saying that he picked on me and how soon some of the world forgot how savagely he killed those people in Kuwait, as savagely as Hitler killed people in his invasions.

Do not make any mistake about it. This man is crazy. Crazy is almost a complimentary word. He is a sick, destructive killer. He killed in Kuwait. He even attempted to assassinate our President, George Bush, Senior, our former President, George Bush, Senior. He went and gased his own people and some of the Kurds. He gased entire villages, and there is no doubt about that. There is no question. He admitted to it. He took some pride in it.

The United Nations came up with some resolutions; and they said we will stop the invasion of Iraq, the coalition invasion of Iraq if you comply. Will you comply? And Saddam Hussein says, yes, I will comply. He signed the documents. He swore to the documents, and over the last 9 years, he swore to the documents. Year after year he swore to the documents. Year after year he swore to the documents. Year after year he swore to the documents. Year after year he said I do not have weapons of mass destruction; bring in the inspectors. Time after time after time after time he blocked the inspections in his country.

We can actually realize a great victory. President Bush, despite the diplomatic pressure that has been put against him by some in the world, despite some of the pressure, and unfortunately by some of our Democratic leadership within this Congress, despite the pressure that his approach was the wrong approach, he has at least cornered Saddam Hussein; and thanks to President Bush, Saddam Hussein, at least at this point, has come back and said he will allow inspections, unconditional inspections in his country. That was not Saddam Hussein's position when President Clinton was there, and I am not trying to be partisan. I am just telling my colleagues this is a position of noninspection that he has been locked in for some time.

President Bush has forced Saddam to play his hand, and his hand right now is to allow inspections; and the President and the administration and this Congress ought to take him up on that offer, and we ought to send inspectors in there by the plane-load, and we ought to inspect everything. We ought to look at every palace. We ought to look in every closet. We ought to look under every street. We ought to look at their nuclear facilities, their power plants; and when we find weapons, we should demand that they be disarmed, and if they are not disarmed, the coalition should go in there and disarm them. This man has a history of lying and deception. Let me give my colleagues an example.

U.N. Security Resolution 678, Iraq must comply with the resolution in regards to the illegal invasion of Kuwait. They broke it.

U.N. Resolution 688, Iraq must release prisoners detained during the civil war. They broke it. Same, 688, Iraq must return Kuwaiti property seized during the Gulf War. They did not do it.

U.N. Resolution 687, April 3, 1991, Iraq must not use, develop, construct or acquire any weapons of mass destruction. They have. They have defied this, but they have acquired the weapons they are not supposed to acquire. Iraq must not commit or support terrorism or allow terrorist organizations to operate in Iraq. They allow terrorist organizations in Iraq; and by the way, these are the kind of organizations that we are speaking about in Iraq.

Take a look at this poster. If this does not give my colleagues a sobering moment, I do not know what will. Follow me to the left by looking at the poster: "We are emerging stronger and will hit America's shopping malls, stadiums and kindergartens. This is our promise." The al Qaeda. This quote is from last week. This quote to my left, look at that, kindergartens. They fully intend to kill every man, woman and child in America they can get their hands on. Iraq is not supposed to have anything to do with these kind of organizations; but they do, in violation of the U.N. resolutions.

U.N. Resolution 707, Iraq must cease attempts to conceal and move weapons of mass destruction and related materials. They broke it. Iraq must make a full and final and complete disclosure of its weapons of mass destruction. They broke that commitment.

U.N. Resolution 715, October 1991, Iraq must fully cooperate with the United Nations and the inspectors. They broke it.

U.N. Resolution 949, October 15, 1994, Iraq must not utilize its military and other forces in a hostile manner. They fire at the United States and British and coalition aircraft every day of the week we are in the air. They broke it.

□ 2030

Iraq must fully cooperate with the inspectors. They broke it.

U.N. Resolution 1051, Iraq must fully cooperate with the U.N. and allow immediate, unconditional, unrestricted access. They broke it.

U.N. Resolution 1060, they must cooperate with the weapons inspectors and allow requested access. They broke it.

U.N. Resolution 1115, June 21, they must give further requirements in regards to inspections. They broke that one.

U.N. Resolution 1134, they must give unrestricted access, another access issue. They broke that.

U.N. Resolution 1137 condemns the continued violations of Iraq of previous resolutions, reaffirms their responsibility, reaffirms the responsibility of Iraq to carry out their commitments. They broke it.

They broke 1194, 1204, 1205, and 1284. Resolution after resolution after resolution after resolution, the Iraqi leadership has lied, been deceitful, and broken resolutions one after another.

In fact, I am not sure there is one United Nations resolution out there where Iraq has kept its word, that relates to their invasion of Kuwait or access to their weapons of mass destruction, or that relates to their helping train terrorists.

My congratulations to President Bush. President Bush and his team, Mr. Powell, Mr. Rumsfeld and Ms. Rice, have forced Saddam to at least say he will allow inspections again. And for his own good health, I think it would be beneficial for him this time, instead of lying about it, that he follow through with exactly what he was supposed to do for the last 10 years, and that is to allow full, complete inspections of the facilities anywhere in his country those inspectors intend to visit.

This President has done something that no other government in the world has been able to do with Iraq. In a period of 2 or 3 months, by directly making it clear that Iraq will not continue to flagrantly violate the conditions of the United Nations agreements that they agreed to and they knew about and we agreed to and we knew about, this President has drawn the line in the sand.

Guess what got results? We only get results out of countries like Iraq by forcing it. We have got to use a force play. There is no negotiating with this guy. There is no loving and hugging and telling him let us have some soft talk, some warm, fuzzy discussions, and promise us that you are going to comply and not poison your people any more, not kill innocent men, women and children any more, and have some type of freedom in your country, have some kind of respect for rights of women in your country.

The only way to get it is to force it, and this President has forced. This is just the opening stage, the first step in bringing Iraq back in with the world community, in bringing Iraq back in line with what we hope would be a contribution to peace in this world.

President Bush is exactly where he needs to be. He is right on track. He has, without the firing of a single shot, forced the world's madman to open his country to inspections.

Now, if this madman fails to do that, I think President Bush will successfully put a coalition through United Nations resolution to fire a shot if necessary to force Iraq to come back in with the world community and to stop building weapons of mass destruction, weapons that would make September 11 look small in proportion to the type of devastation that they could do.

President Bush, since September 11, has found a more focused purpose and has exercised good leadership. I have to tell Members, our colleagues on the other side of the aisle and the Democrat leadership have stalled. They have criticized the President. Look at what has happened in the last few days. The President is accomplishing what we want to accomplish. So in a bipartisan effort, we should pass a resolution in this House supporting the President. We should pass a resolution supporting the President in a way that he continues down the path that he is headed, and that is a path that so far just in the past couple of weeks, his strong movements, his very directed comments as to what was going to happen and his directed action, has forced Iraq to play their first hand. They threw down their hand, and they are allowing inspections.

It may not work, but you better not mess around with this country and with the U.N. coalition. This country, under the direction of President Bush, is not going through this exercise in futility. President Bush does not consider this an exercise. He considers this, and this Nation considers this, and the United Nations Security Council should consider this and do consider it, a very serious matter which will be followed through with.

We intend to follow through and disarm Iraq from weapons of mass destruction. We will accomplish that goal, and we will accomplish that goal under the leadership of President Bush. To this point we have done pretty well so far. It is just the beginning. But so far the President has had tremendous success.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the Democratic leadership, I am begging the Democratic leadership, put aside your partisanship and your objections on the Sunday talk shows and help our President help our effort here. Just in the opening stage, we are going to be able to get inspectors into Iraq. If the going gets tough, stick with us. It is time.

I have to say, Members, a lot of Democrats not in leadership are supporting this and are supporting the President. But the leadership needs to quit playing politics and come on board with us. This matter is much too serious for partisanship. I invite them on the team. The President has done a good job so far, and so has his team.

PRESCRIPTION DRUG BENEFIT FOR SENIORS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHUSTER). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. PALLONE) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the minority leader.

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, this evening, and it is certainly not the first time, I am coming to the floor to talk about the need for a prescription drug benefit under Medicare, and also to deal with the rising costs for prescription drugs. I think this Congress has an obligation before we adjourn in another month or so to address both issues because the bottom line is that not only more senior, more Americans are facing rising prescription drug costs, and I think it is primarily due to the fact that the brand name drug industry is trying to control prices in a way to make sure they receive maximum profits and influence the United States Congress both in terms of political contributions, influence the public with TV ads, all of which make it very difficult to address the issue and the need for a Medicare prescription drug benefit and some sort of effort to control prices or at least bring prices down because of the impact that it is having on our health care system.

Mr. Speaker, I do not need to tell any American about the rising cost of prescription drugs. As the cost goes up, more and more Americans are not able to afford their medicine. That has an impact because, as we know, certainly in the last 20 years, certainly in the last generation, prescription drug medications have become a preventive measure. In other words, if you are able to take certain prescription drugs, you do not need to be hospitalized or go to a nursing home or have some sort of radical medical procedures. Prescription drugs essentially are a form of prevention, a more serious interference in terms of medical care.

I just think that it is very unfortunate that we do not address the problem of rising cost and what it means for the average American, particularly for the average senior.

I wanted to start out this evening by giving some information about the level of price increases. This is an analysis that was done by Families U.S.A. just a couple of months ago in June of this year. It says that the prices of the 50 most prescribed drugs rose on average by nearly 3 times the rate of inflation last year.

The study analyzed price increases for the 50 most commonly prescribed drugs for seniors for the last year, and that is January 2001 through January 2002, and then for the past 5 years and before that the last 10 years. The report found that nearly three-quarters, 36 out of 50, of these drugs rose at least 1.5 times the rate of inflation, while one-third, 8 out of 50, rose 3 more times the rate of inflation.

The drugs that experienced the largest price increases were the following, and I am not going to get into all of the details, but it gives some incredible examples. Demadex and Premarin rose nearly 7 times the rate of inflation. Plavix rose more than 6 times the rate of inflation. Zestril, Lipitor, and Combivent rose more than 5 times the rate of inflation.

The interesting thing about it is that if we compare price increases of generic versions of these same brand name drugs, and this is what the report did, the report showed that the brand name drugs rose 4.5 times faster than the rate of price increases for generic drugs, 8.1 percent versus 1.8 percent, and 10 of the 50 most prescribed drugs for seniors are generic, and the average annual price for those drugs was $375. Nine of these 10 drugs did not increase in price at all.

The point that that makes, and I think it is particularly important in light of the Democrats making a push in the next few days to try to get a bill brought up in committee that seeks to encourage more generic drugs, is that the brand name drug prices were increasing rapidly, whereas generic drugs were not.

When we talk about generic drugs, a lot of people are familiar with generics and understand what it means, but a lot of people are not. What we have found repeatedly is that if we can bring a generic drug to market, in other words, if the patent for the brand name drug expires and you can have a number of companies selling a generic drug in lieu of the patent drug, that will significantly bring down costs. Generics are one way of bringing down costs, and that also needs to be addressed by this Congress.

What are the Republicans and the Democrats doing about this problem? We know we have a problem of price increases with prescription drugs. We know that Medicare right now does not include any kind of prescription drug benefit unless you happen to be in an HMO, and many of the HMOs have dropped seniors in the last couple of years.

So what is the Congress doing about it? Well, the Democrats have really come up with a very simple solution. The Democrats have proposed basically expanding Medicare to provide a prescription drug benefit. Those Members who are familiar with Medicare know that under part B of Medicare, which takes care of the doctors' bills, basically what seniors do, and 99 percent of the seniors do this when they participate in Medicare, they pay a monthly premium, so much a month. It is usually $45–50 a month, and they pay a deductible of $100 for their first doctor bill. But after that, 80 percent of the doctors' bills are paid for by the Federal Government under Medicare, and they pay 20 percent up to a certain amount when the government pays 100 percent.

The Democrats proposed and we have legislation that would accomplish the same goal and do it in the same way, provide a prescription drug benefit under Medicare that was guaranteed, that was universal, that all seniors and everyone eligible for Medicare would take advantage of, and essentially you would pay $25 a month premium, you would have a deductible of $100, and after that 80 percent of your prescription drug costs would be paid for by Medicare by the Federal Government. There would be a 20 percent copay.

And after someone had shelled out $2,500 out of pocket, if that were the case in paying the 20 percent, then all of their prescription drug bills would be paid for 100 percent, modeled after what we do now for doctor bills.

It makes sense. It is very simple. Medicare has been a very successful program. Given that more and more seniors do not have access or have problems paying for prescription drugs, this would seem to be a logical solution. It is certainly logical, certainly reasonable; but the problem is that the Republican leadership in the House, because they are so much in the pockets of the brand-name drug companies, would not even consider something like that. When the Democrats tried to bring it up as a substitute to the Republican bill, they ruled it out of order. They would not let it come up.

What have the Republicans proposed instead of a simple expansion of Medicare to include prescription drugs? They have talked about the need for privatization. In the same way that President Bush has talked for privatizing Medicare as a whole, the Republican leadership in the House has moved a bill and passed a bill, because they have the majority, they have the votes, to simply provide private health insurance or try to encourage seniors to seek out private health insurance that would cover their prescription drugs, basically give seniors a certain amount of money like a voucher so that they could go shop around and see if they could find a private insurance plan that would pay for prescription drugs.

I would venture to suggest to my colleagues that this is the most absurd idea; and the reason I say that is because if the private sector was able to effectively provide prescription drug benefits in the same way that people thought that maybe the private sector would be able to provide for health insurance for seniors in general, then we would not need a government program.

The reason that we have Medicare in general to pay for hospital bills, to pay for doctor bills, is because when seniors prior to Medicare, 30, 40 years ago, tried to go out to buy private health insurance to pay for their medical bills, they could not find it because they were too high risk. They were using too much health care. They could not find a health insurance policy that would provide the coverage. And so that is why we started Medicare as a government program. Not because we were socialists and wanted a government program; but because, practically speaking, seniors could not find health insurance, they could not buy it. It was not available.

So now why would we want to do the same thing, why would we want to suggest to seniors that they go out and try to buy health insurance privately that just covers prescription drugs? That is even less likely to be available because most seniors use prescription drugs and anybody who knows the way insurance operates, the private sector knows, that private insurance companies only want to provide insurance to low-risk individuals. They do not want to provide insurance where everybody who is covered by the policy is going to take advantage of the benefit and need the prescription drugs, because they cannot make any money if they sell insurance that provides that kind of a benefit. So the Republican proposal is essentially absurd from the get-go because it will never work, because if there was private insurance available, seniors would just go out and buy it and they cannot buy it because it is not available.

I would venture to say to my colleagues that what is really going on here is that the Republicans are doing the bidding of the brand-name drug companies. The brand-name drug companies do not want a Medicare benefit, and they do not want anything that would interfere in the rising price and cost and profits that they make from selling prescription drugs. Even if it means selling it to fewer and fewer people, they are making more and more of a profit.

In case anyone doubts what I say, I just wanted to point out very briefly this evening, and I have done this before, some of the things that are going on with the brand-name drug companies to accomplish their goal of preventing a real prescription drug benefit that would be meaningful to seniors. On the day when the Republican bill that I talked about, the privatization bill, was brought up and considered in the Committee on Energy and Commerce, which has jurisdiction over prescription drugs and that I am a member of, there was a fundraiser for the Republican National Committee the same night; and because the drug companies were so involved in the fundraiser for the Republican National Committee, the committee actually broke at 5 o'clock and carried over its business to the next day because all the Republicans had to go to this fundraiser where they would get money from the prescription drug industry.

This is an article from The Washington Post on that day in June, and the headline says: "Drug Firms Among Big Donors at GOP Event."

"Pharmaceutical companies are among 21 donors paying $250,000 each for red-carpet treatment at tonight's GOP fundraising gala starring President Bush, two days after Republicans unveiled a prescription drug plan the industry is backing, according to GOP officials."

"Drug companies, in particular, have made a rich investment at tonight's event." It goes on to describe all the money that they were giving, but the article further on says that "every company giving money to the event has business before Congress. But the juxtaposition of the prescription drug debate on Capitol Hill and drug companies helping underwrite a major fundraiser highlights the tight relationship lawmakers have with groups seeking to influence the work before them."

"A senior House GOP leadership aide said yesterday that Republicans are working hard behind the scenes on behalf of PhRMA," that is the pharmaceutical company trade group, "to make sure that the party's prescription drug plan for the elderly suits drug companies."

What was going on here was that the big drug companies were not only giving to the Republican campaign coffers, they were writing the bill. They wanted to make sure that the bill that was written by the Republicans that came out of committee and came to the floor was a bill that suited them and suited them because either it would not work because it was the privatization proposal that does not work or at least would guarantee that there was no effort to reduce or have any influence over prices. And if anyone doubts that, I will read a little section from the Republican prescription drug bill that is entitled "Noninterference."

Basically what it says is that the administrator of their program, of their prescription drug program, could not in any way try to reduce prices. I will just read you some sections. This is the actual bill.

It says that "the administrator of the program may not require a particular formulary or institute a price structure for the reimbursement of covered outpatient care; two, interfere in any way with negotiations between PDP sponsors and Medicare+Choice organizations and drug manufacturers, wholesalers or other suppliers of covered outpatient drugs; and, three, and this is most important, otherwise interfere with the competitive nature of providing such coverage through such sponsors and organizations."

So what they did with this noninterference clause in their bill, and I know it is a little bureaucratic there, but the bottom line is it says that you cannot interfere in anything that would deal with pricing, with price structure. Remember, I mentioned before that the Democratic bill expands Medicare to include a prescription drug benefit. It does not operate with the private sector. It simply expands Medicare to include a prescription drug benefit. We do the opposite with regard to the cost issue. In the Democratic bill we say that the Secretary of Health and Human Services must, is mandated, to negotiate and reduce prices, because the idea now is that there are going to be 30 or 40 million seniors in the Medicare program who now have this prescription drug benefit; and if the Secretary of Health and Human Services negotiates for them, he can bring down prices maybe 30, 40 percent because he now has the power to negotiate for all these 30, 40 million senior citizens.

This is what happens now with the VA. The Veterans' Administration does this. They negotiate for the veterans in order to bring down prices. The military does this, the Army, Navy. They all negotiate on behalf of the military personnel to bring down prices so they get a really good price for their prescription drugs. That is what the Democrats do in their bill.

The Republicans say, You cannot do that. We do not want you to do that. Not only did the drug companies give all this money to the Republicans, not only did they write the bill to make sure that they were protected in the sense that there would be no effort to reduce price, but also they started running ads almost immediately after the Republican bill passed the House of Representatives touting the fact that certain Republicans who were running in tough races this November to be re-elected, that those Republicans had voted for the Republican bill and how wonderful they were and how wonderful they were to their senior constituents because they voted for this bill. Amazingly, if you think about it, you give money to prevent the good bill from coming up, you make sure that your bill is the one that is written, and then you go out on the airwaves and you pay for advertisers who tell the American public that the person who voted for this pharmaceutical boondoggle is doing the right thing and in some way is some sort of a hero. But this is exactly what was done.

There is a report that I have, and this was actually done by Public Citizen, another nonprofit group. They pointed out in the report issued in July of this year that United Seniors Association, which is the group that is running these ads telling you how wonderful the Congressmen are that voted for the Republican bill, is basically nothing but a front group for the drug industry. Drug companies gave that organization that runs these ads and pretends to be sort of neutral $10 million initially to push the drug bill favored by the industry.

In fact, the information I have, which is really new information, this week, says that not only has this alleged senior group that is being underwritten or financed by PhRMA, by the drug companies, not only did they start running the ads in June or July after the Republican bill passed here, but they have continued to run ads and now as of, I guess this is dated yesterday, September 16, which I am going to read you now, they are just pumping even more money into these ads. This is a "Daily Health Report" from the Kaiser Network, the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation, Kaiser Network. It says that the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers Association, that is PhRMA, the drug companies' trade group, has contributed millions of dollars in recent months for political ads in several States with tight congressional races.

For example, the industry group has provided the United Seniors Association, which runs the ads, with more than $8 million for ads promoting about two dozen House candidates who support the House-passed GOP drug bill which includes the prescription drug benefit. The commercials began running last week in about 20 regions where Republicans face tough races this fall. The ads are tailored to each race, stating that the candidate understands the need to assist seniors with health care costs and supports adding meaningful drug coverage for all seniors. The ads end by encouraging viewers to call their respective Congressman and urge him to keep fighting for his bill. The association's campaign, which also includes Internet and direct mailing efforts, is supported by a general education grant from PhRMA.

In addition, another group, the 60 Plus Association, has been running radio and newspaper advertising in selected States backing the GOP-backed drug bill. The National Journal reports that both groups are helping Republican candidates and drug companies by promoting industry-backed legislation.

I do not want to keep going on, but the other thing that we found is that not only are the drug companies financing these ads telling people to support candidates that support their bill but now they are also putting pressure on companies to not support an alternative bill which the Democrats are pushing in particular this week that would make it easier for generics to come to market. This is from the same report, from the Kaiser Network.

It says that in other prescription drug news, pressure from the pharmaceutical industry has forced several companies to drop their support of a Senate-passed bill, S. 812, that would ease market entry of generic drugs, according to a Washington Post editorial from yesterday.

Earlier this month, Georgia-Pacific and Verizon Communications left or reduced their roles in Business for Affordable Medicine, a coalition lobbying for easier access to generic drugs, after brand-name drug makers threatened to end contracts with the companies. Georgia-Pacific asked to not be listed on the coalition's Web site after receiving pressure from Eli Lilly, and Verizon left the coalition recently after being pressed by Wyeth. Since then, Marriott International quit the coalition and UPS has asked to be removed from the Web site. "Given that all these companies stand to benefit from lower drug prices, it's a fair guess that drug company pressure had something to do with their decisions." The Washington Post stated, concluding that it is a "worrying sign" that the "eminently reasonable reform" passed by the Senate "faces tough sledding in the House, whose Members now have to choose between affordable medicines and placating the drug lobby."

Let me explain a little bit what this generic drug bill is that the Democrats are pushing now, again in an effort to try to reduce costs. What basically has been happening is that brand-name companies get a patent for a particular drug, a prescription drug when they develop it, when they do the research and they develop it. They are able to seek a patent and gain a patent where they have so many years where they exclusively can sell the drug because they produced it, or they researched and developed it. The reason that that patent is given is because it is basically incentive for a company or an individual to develop a new miracle drug.

But after so many years when this exclusivity runs out, the theory is that the drug companies benefited greatly and made a lot of profit on the drug, then generic companies, basically any company can come in and produce a similar generic drug which obviously is sold for significantly less and is one way of trying to reduce costs for prescription drugs.

But the problem is that over the years the brand name drug companies have tried to come up with all kinds of ways of getting around the end of their patent, by renewing it, or playing some kind of games or gimmicks, if you will, to try to get the patent extended or get a new patent that is similar to the old one so you cannot bring generics to market.

I do not want to get into all the details of this, but I want to give one example. Under current law, when a generic drug seeks FDA approval and a brand company's drug is patented, the brand company can sue the generic for patent infringement. But under the current law, which is called Hatch-Waxman, it forbids the FDA from approving the generic application for 30 months.

Basically what they are saying is if the patent has expired and a generic wants to come in and produce the same drug, but the company that has the patent feels that somehow the patent is going to be infringed, the FDA basically gives a stay for 30 months, if you will, before the generic can come to market. What the brand companies have done is they have used this provision by dragging out lawsuits and by obtaining a series of 30-month delays through the last-minute filing of new and sometimes frivolous patents.

I do not want to get into all the details of this, but the bottom line is they can keep running the period when the patent is exclusive, essentially, and force the situation where the generic drug does not come to market. There are all kinds of examples like this.

Some of my colleagues, on a bipartisan basis, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN), a Democrat, and the gentlewoman from Missouri (Mrs. EMERSON), a Republican, introduced a bill called the Prescription Drug Fair Competition Act, H.R. 5272, that seeks to basically get rid of a lot of these loopholes so that the generics can easily come to market and these patent abuses cannot continue.

This bill actually passed in the Senate, I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, by the other body, but so far our efforts, primarily by the Democrats, to bring this bill up in this House and have it passed here so it can go to the President and be signed into law have achieved nothing. The Republican leadership refuses to have a hearing in committee, refuses to allow a vote to bring it out of committee, refuses to let it come to the floor of the House.

Now, this is only one way of trying to reduce costs, but a very effective way. Essentially what we have been seeing in the House under the Republican leadership is that every effort that has been made, either by the Democrats or on a bipartisan basis as this generic bill was, to try to come up with formulas that would reduce costs, the Republican leadership just will not allow it to come up.

As I mentioned before, in their own benefit bill, their prescription drug benefit bill, the privatization bill, they have this non-interference clause that says you cannot negotiate price reduction. The Democrats mandate in their bill that prices are reduced. The Democrats in the other body, they actually passed a bill that would plug up these generic loopholes. The Republicans in the House refused to bring it up.

There are many other examples. We have bills that would allow reimportation from Canada. As I think many of my colleagues know, if you compare the United States and the price of drugs in the United States to almost every other developed country, you take like the top 5 or 6 countries by gross national product, Britain, France, or even smaller countries like Canada or Italy, whatever, Western Europe, other developed countries, you will find that prescription drug prices are significantly less, sometimes 30 or 40 percent of the cost of what you would pay in the United States. So one of my colleagues, the gentleman from Maine (Mr. ALLEN), proposed a bill that said that the cost that companies charge for prescription drugs in the United States has to be comparable to what citizens in these other countries pay.

Well, of course, we cannot get that bill posted by the Republicans. They will not allow that to be posted.

We have also tried to, as I said, pass a bill that would allow you to reimport a drug. In other words, you could apply to a drugstore in Canada, for example, over the Internet, or even physically go to Canada and bring the drugs back into the United States. Legislation has been introduced by my colleague, the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. SANDERS), that would allow reimportation from Canada. Republicans will not let that bill come up. That has not come to the floor.

The list goes on and on. Probably one of the worst examples is that right now, when the brand name drug companies advertise for certain drugs on TV and encourage you to use a brand name as opposed to a generic for a particular drug, the advertising costs are actually underwritten by the taxpayers. They get a tax credit or deduction for that kind of advertising. That actually encourages you as the consumer to pay higher prices for the brand name drug.

So all of these things, we have legislation on the Democratic side that would eliminate the tax subsidy or the deduction or the tax credit for that kind of advertising by the pharmaceutical companies. We cannot bring that up either. They will not allow it.

The Republican leadership does not want us in any way to address the issue of cost and trying to reduce costs for prescription drugs, because basically the drug industry is behind the Republican efforts, paying for the Republican candidates, and they are basically in the pockets of the brand name drug industry.

I do not mention this because I am trying to be evil or trying to say that all Republicans are bad or anything of that nature, but the problem is that the leadership very much does whatever the brand name drug industry wants, and that is the main reason why we are not able to get any kind of effort to reduce prices, and it is another reason why we are not able to get any kind of expansion of Medicare to include prescription drugs.

Mr. Speaker, I just would like to take a little more time, and then I am going to conclude this evening, to talk about the benefit.

My constituents in New Jersey over the last 2 or 3 years since the Medicare+Choice, the HMO programs effectively tried to sign up a lot of seniors under Medicare on the theory that if you signed up for an HMO you would get your prescription drug coverage, because Medicare does not normally cover it, but some of the HMOs that were offering Medicare policies in New Jersey were offering a prescription drug plan as part of their HMO Medicare policy.

But what we found is that more and more of the HMOs after 6 months or a year would pull out of the Medicare program and would not give seniors the option, if you will, of joining an HMO and getting their prescription drug benefits.

There was an article just last week in the New York Times dated September 10 entitled "HMOs for 200,000 Pulling Out of Medicare" by Robert Pear. It says, "Health maintenance organizations serving 200,000 elderly and disabled people said they will pull out of Medicare next year, raising to 2.4 million the number of beneficiaries that have been dropped by HMOs since 1998."

Again, if you talk about a privatization plan for prescription drugs, we already have the example with HMOs which were offering prescription drugs to seniors and increasingly have dropped them because they cannot afford to provide the benefit. It seems to me that that goes far to explain why a privatization program for seniors to provide seniors with a prescription drug will not work, and that is why you have to simply expand Medicare along the lines of what the Democrats have talked about in order to provide a decent benefit.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude with that, but I want to say that I am going to be here many times, many nights, over the next 3, 4, 5 weeks before we adjourn, and I know I am going to be joined by a lot of my colleagues on the Democratic side, saying that before we adjourn we need a Medicare prescription drug benefit that covers all seniors and everyone under Medicare and that is affordable, and, secondly, that we need to address the issue of price and rising costs for prescription drugs, pass the generic bill, provide some kind of reimportation, provide some sort of process whereby the agency that administers the Medicare program can negotiate cheaper drug prices. All these things have to be done.

If any of my colleagues on either side of the aisle doubt that this is an important issue for the average American, whether they are a senior or not, they just should spend a couple of days at a forum or talking to their constituents on the street, and they will find that they are crying out for this Congress to address this prescription drug issue in an effective way.

ENSURING FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHUSTER). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I can assure you and the staff that I will not take that much time. That might be the best news I can give.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a few minutes of this hour to talk about an issue that I think, as my friend from New Jersey feels that the issue he is talking about, prescription drugs, is important, and I would agree it is important, but I want to talk about freedom of speech.

I think that there is nothing except the Bible that is more sacred to the American people than the Constitution. It is second only, again, to the Bible.

Tonight I want to talk a little bit about H.R. 2357. This is a bill that I introduced about 2 years ago. I actually have 130 sponsors, and I believe you, Mr. Speaker tonight in the Chair, are a cosponsor of this also.

In this country we have our men and women in uniform that right now are overseas in Afghanistan, and they could be called on to be in other parts of the world to defend the national security of this country, and the national security of this country includes our constitutional rights and our freedoms, the things that we cherish. We really appreciate those who have given their life for this country in the past and what they have done to ensure that we would have the freedoms that we enjoy in this great, great Nation, blessed by God Almighty.

I would like to give a little bit of the history of this bill that I put in. If this was 1953, Mr. Speaker, I would not even be on the floor, because there would be no issue. In 1953, the churches, synagogues and other houses of worship had no restriction on what they might say in their church. But in 1954, Lyndon Baines Johnson, the United States Senator from Texas and the majority leader, was very offended that there was a 501(c)3 group that was opposed to his reelection by the name of the H.L. Hunt family. These were not churches. These were think tanks, as we know them today, and they were opposed to his reelection.

So what Lyndon Johnson did, he put an amendment on a revenue bill going through the Senate in 1954 that was never debated. There was no debate at all. The Republican minority accepted what they call a UC, a unanimous consent, so therefore it became the law. It gave the authority to the Internal Revenue Service that the Internal Revenue Service would be able to, if you will, evaluate what could and could not be said in a church, synagogue or mosque.

Mr. Speaker, I am of the firm belief that those men who came to this country along with their wives years and years and years ago came to this country for religious freedom. They came here to build a new nation, a nation that would be and still is blessed by God Almighty.

Mr. Speaker, my problem is, and the reason I introduced H.R. 2357, that I believe that spiritual leaders of this country must have the freedom to talk about the issues of the day, whether they be about political issues of the day or whether they be about the moral issues of the day, and sometimes those sermons in those churches have to touch on the political issues of the day.

I will give an example of that, because it happened in my district. A very dear friend of mine who happens to be a Catholic down in New Bern, North Carolina, whose name is Jerry Shield, Jerry asked his priest, Father Rudy at St. Paul's Catholic Church in New Bern, in the year 2000 to just make one little comment the Sunday before the Tuesday election. He said, "Father, how about just saying that George Bush, who is a candidate for President of the United States, is pro-life?"

Believe this or not, Mr. Speaker, the priest said, "Jerry, I cannot say that. If I do, I will violate the 501(c)3 status of this church and we might lose that status."

Mr. Speaker, I am going to tell you that I am offended that any clergy in this country, our spiritual leaders that talk about morality, that talk about the political issues of the day as they see fit to talk about those issues, that they should have any restriction at all on them.

What I wanted to do tonight, I was on the floor last week and I talked about a few of the national leaders who are supportive. Again I want to say we have 130 cosponsors of this bill. I am pleased to tell you that in the last couple of weeks we have picked up three additional Democrats. I want to pick up more.

I am reaching out to my friends on both sides of the aisle to ask them to please look at this as nothing more. It is not a political issue, it is not a party issue, it is just an issue of freedom of speech, because, again, I cannot say it too much, that if this was 1953, I would not be on the floor.

There was no restriction. I have researched this issue and when the churches qualified by the law to become 501(c) status, there is no, no restriction of what they could or could not say.

I want tonight to again just mention a few of the spiritual leaders of this country who support this legislation. Richard Land, the Southern Baptist Convention; James Dobson, we all know is the president of Focus on the Family; David Barton, director of the Wallbuilders. He has been such a strong supporter of this legislation. James Martin, president of the 60 Plus Association; Tim and Beverly LaHaye, the Concerned Women for America; Kent Synder, executive director for the Liberty Principle; Connie Mackey; William Murray, the chairman of the Religious Freedom Coalition; David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union; D. James Kennedy, President of Coral Ridge Ministries; and Ray Flynn, Mr. Speaker, the former ambassador to the Vatican is a strong supporter of this legislation, H.R. 2357, to return the freedom of speech to our churches and synagogues. In addition, Rabbi Daniel Lapin, and I have had the pleasure of talking to him twice now. What a wonderful man of God he is and he is a real inspiration to all of us who love God, there is no question about it. And James Bopp, the constitutional lawyer for the James Madison Center for Free Speech.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, I am very pleased to tell my colleagues tonight that a former Member of the United States House of Representatives, a man that was here my first session in the United States Congress, I had great respect for. I did not really get to know him, I wish I had. But he was a real leader on the Democratic side. His name is Floyd Flake. Dr. Flake is a minister, a former Member of Congress, and he is the pastor of the Greater Allen Cathedral in New York; and he wrote a very strong letter of support for this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, they held a hearing on this issue on May 14, and I am very pleased to tell my colleagues that Dr. D. James Kennedy came up from Florida to testify on behalf of this legislation. In addition, I am pleased to tell my colleagues that another former Member of the House, a Democrat, Walter Fauntroy, Pastor Walter Fauntroy came to testify on behalf of this legislation. Let me read the last paragraph of Dr. Flake's letter.

It says: "I am pleased to offer my wholehearted support with sincere prayer for passage of this important and liberating legislation." That is the key: liberating legislation. Our men and women of faith who are spiritual leaders should have every right they choose to talk about the issues of the day. I know that when Al Gore was running for the Presidency in the year 2000, he was in Dr. Flake's church and after Mr. Gore spoke, the minister said, Dr. Flake said, "I think this is the right man to lead this Nation." Well, then he got a letter of reprimand from the IRS. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is what Dr. Flake felt and wanted to say that to his congregation, there should not have been any Federal Government overseeing what he said in that church.

Then I gave the example earlier of my friend, Jerry Shield, down in New Bern to ask the priest just to say that George Bush is pro-life, let us support George Bush. These are the things that if this was 1953, they would be able to do it without any reservation at all. But Lyndon Johnson, who was an arrogant Member of the Senate at the time, and later became a President that I do not have much respect for his Presidency, quite frankly; but anyway, he put in an amendment without any debate, as I said earlier, that pretty much stifled the churches and synagogues of this country. They did hold a hearing on this legislation, and I want to thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. HOUGHTON), the chairman of the committee, for holding that hearing, because what it did, it gave us a chance to talk about this issue.

I want to read just a couple of comments, Mr. Speaker, because they had two representatives of the IRS to come talk about their authority given again by Lyndon Johnson to stifle the speech of the churches and synagogues in this country. I am not going to read all of the testimony, but I am going to read just a couple of minutes for the RECORD, if I could. Let me use for an example that one of the comments was of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEWIS), who asked Mr. Miller, who represents the Internal Revenue Service at the hearing, and Mr. LEWIS said, "As a rule," again, to the IRS, "do you monitor the activities of churches during the political season?" The IRS representative, Mr. Miller says, "We do monitor churches. We are limited in how we do that by reason of section 7611 and because of the lack of information in the area, because there is no annual filing."

But, Mr. Speaker, this is the point I want to make. He additionally said, "So our monitoring is mostly receipt of information from third parties who are looking."

Well, I think that is a sad commentary on this great Nation that we have to have our churches and synagogues having a third party to look in to see what they are saying, because then that third party, if they believe they have violated the Johnson amendment, can report them to the Internal Revenue Service. Mr. Speaker, that is not what this great Nation is about. That is not what these great men and women in uniform are willing to give their life for. They are willing to give their life for the national security of this country and the freedom of this Nation. But that is what Mr. Miller said: we are dependent on a third party to report the church for violating the Johnson amendment for speaking freely on the political and moral issues of the day.

Then there is another question that Mr. LEWIS asked and I want to read this for the RECORD: "Do you have the ability or the capacity as an agency to monitor the activities of churches and other religious institutions?" Mr. Miller with the Internal Revenue Service says, "The only thing we can rely upon again is who would be in that audience to report it."

Mr. Speaker, I think that is so tragic. We have a law in the land of this country that restricts freedom of speech in our churches and synagogues, and we have to depend on a third party to be there to report that to the Internal Revenue Service. That again is not what should be in this country. The spiritual leaders of this great Nation should have the right to choose whatever they feel that they must say from their heart and their God to their members who are in that congregation. But again, Mr. Miller has been very honest on the committee on May 14, and he acknowledged we are dependent on a third party to report churches and synagogues who might violate the law of the land. Well, my point there is that how in the world, with all of the churches and synagogues and mosques in this country, can we enforce this law? The law is unjustified, it is unneeded, and should never have been adopted. It was done in 1954 at night without any debate. We should pass H.R. 2357 and return the freedom of speech to our churches and synagogues.

Just one more point on this, Mr. Speaker, and then I am going to work toward a close. Let me read this letter, and this is what really bothers me more than anything. This might better explain to the Congress what we are trying to say. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. WELLER) was also on that committee that I mentioned that the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEWIS) served on, the oversight committee chaired by the gentleman from New York (Mr. HOUGHTON). The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. WELLER) asked this question: "So just to follow up on that, say you have a candidate who is a guest speaker, was in a church speaking from the pulpit, concludes his or her remarks, and the minister walks up, puts his hands or arms around the particular candidate and says, this is the right candidate; I urge you to support this candidate. Is that allowable under current law?" That is the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. WELLER) to Mr. Hopkins, who represents the Internal Revenue Service, and he says, "No, that would not be allowable under law. That would clearly be political campaign activity. It would be protected, however, under the two bills that are specifically the subject of this hearing," a bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CRANE) and myself, Congressman JONES, H.R. 2357.

Mr. Speaker, I came to this floor last week, and I am going to come a couple times this week and a couple of times next week, because I hope that the leadership of the House will bring this to the floor of the Congress to vote on. I believe sincerely that if this country is going to have a great future, and we are a Nation who cannot forget that this Nation has been blessed by God; if we are going to have a strong Nation, then our preachers, our priests, and our rabbis must have a right to talk about the issues of the day. And sometimes those moral issues of the day become political issues. I think that our ministers must have the right to talk about those issues of the day if this country is going to remain morally strong.

Let me start closing by reading a letter; it will not take but just a couple of minutes. This is a minister who is an African American minister down in Raleigh, North Carolina, and I know him, I have talked to him by phone; and I have a great deal of respect for him. He is a strong man of God. I had read an article in a Raleigh paper; all the liberal press, Mr. Speaker, they just cannot understand this legislation. The liberals just cannot understand it. I guess they forget that they are protected by the Constitution and so should the ministers and priests and rabbis, as far as I am concerned.

Let me read this. It is from Marian B. Robinson, minister of the St. Matthew AME Church in Raleigh, North Carolina, and it will not take but a moment.

"Dear Congressman Jones: I read with interest an article printed in Raleigh News and Observer as it pertained to H.R. 2157, the Houses of Worship Political Speech Protection Act. Thank you for introducing a bill that will give free speech to houses of worship on issues of moral and political significance without the fear of losing their tax exempt status. If the churches cannot do it, then who can?"

Second paragraph: "Secondly, the black church has always been a platform and forum to get the message out to our people since we have no other institution or places to go or turn to. The church continues to be the mouthpiece for informing and directing our people on most things. Part of our job consists of trying to keep families strong and together by instilling morals and values and the teachings of Christ. We need freedom of speech from the pulpits without fear of reprisals. This will help us carry out our tasks in a manner pleasing to God and meaningful to the people."

Mr. Speaker, the reason I wanted to read that letter is because this support is across the board. It is from people of faith, whether they be African American, whether they be Muslim, whether they be Catholic, Jew, or Protestant. They support this legislation because they fully understand, as I understand, that the strength of this country is the fact that our spiritual leaders have the freedom to talk about these issues.

I must say that as Pastor Robinson asked me in this letter of support, Mr. Speaker, if they are not going to have the right to talk about these issues, then who is going to talk about them? What I say to the liberal press is, I do not have much respect for the liberal press. When it suits their needs, they support it; when it does not suit their needs, then they do not support it. But I will tell my colleagues that I never saw in 1953, and I have had my staff to do a lot of research, I never saw any editorial or any news article that took the churches to task for what they might have said of a political nature in 1953. None.

So, Mr. Speaker, tonight as I close, I do want to mention this. The IRS also has what they call code words. They do not just have to say to the minister that just because you say that you want to support myself, Congressman JONES, or as the minister mentioned earlier, another candidate, that that would be a violation. That would be a violation was the answer to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. WELLER). But this is what I want to start closing with tonight, Mr. Speaker, is that they print a publication that is called "Election Year Issues," and they give an example of code words, C-O-D-E, code words. And these code words can, if used, can bring the IRS into looking into that church's activity.

Let me just give an example of code words: liberal, pro-life, pro-choice, anti-choice, Republican, Democrat, and there are others.

These are code words that the IRS can use if they think that there is a violation. They do not mention the candidate; but they might mention a code word, and the IRS can come in and threaten a church.

Mr. Speaker, tonight as I close, and again, I am like many Members of Congress on both sides of this aisle, I have great faith in God. This is the greatest Nation in the world because we are a Nation that understands that we are blessed by God almighty.

I just think and I hope that in the next couple of weeks that the leadership will give the Congress a chance to debate this issue, to vote on this legislation; and I hope the majority of the Members of this House will vote to pass this legislation.

Again, I close by reminding the House that in 1953, and up to 1953, there were no restrictions on the churches and synagogues in this country. So let us return the freedom of speech to the spiritual leaders of this country so that they can do their job for our God.

Mr. Speaker, I close this way because I have three military bases in my district: Cherry Point Marine Air Station, Camp Lejeune Marine Base, and Seymour Johnson Air Force Base. Every time I speak, and I spoke Monday night at the Christian Coalition banquet down in my district, and I was pleased to say that the Republican candidate for the United States Senate, Elizabeth Dole, was there and did a fantastic job of giving her testimony, I close this way, and I have ever since September 11.

I first ask God to please bless our men and women in uniform, I ask God to please bless the families of our men and women in uniform, and I ask God to please bless the President of the United States as he leads this Nation. I ask God to please bless the men and women who serve in the House and Senate.

I ask God, and I say it three times, please God, please God, please God, continue to bless America.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

IN RECOGNITION OF ILLINOIS
STATE REPRESENTATIVE MARY LOU COWLISHAW

HON. J. DENNIS HASTERT

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. HASTERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the invaluable contributions of State Representative Mary Lou Cowlshaw over her nearly 20 years of service to the people of Illinois as a member of the Illinois General Assembly. Moreover, I am proud to have served alongside her during her first four years of service.

As a parent and former public school teacher, I would like to commend Representative Cowlshaw for her strong commitment to improving educational opportunities for the young people of Illinois. As the Ranking Member of the Illinois House Elementary and Secondary Education Committee and as a board member of the Lisle School District 202 Foundation, Representative Cowlshaw has done an exceptional job of advancing education and thereby securing the well-being and future success of all children in Illinois.

During her tenure in the Illinois General Assembly, Representative Cowlshaw's efforts contributed to the establishment of the Illinois Mathematics and Science Academy located in my congressional district. She has also worked tirelessly to advocate innovative approaches to increase student learning, improve teacher quality, and expand access to teaching in mathematics and science.

And, Representative Cowlshaw's exemplary dedication to the young people of Illinois extends well beyond the walls of the classroom. In fact, this past March, the Illinois Coalition to End Homelessness honored Representative Cowlshaw for her work to improve the educational rights of homeless students across the Nation.

When Representative Cowlshaw retires from the Illinois State House of Representatives at the end of this year, she should carry with her the knowledge that she has made the Illinois General Assembly, and particularly the State of Illinois, a better place.

Whereas, Robert and Zema must be commended for their loyalty and dedication to their family; and

HONORING DR. RICHARD WARREN

HON. JAMES P. MCGOVERN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. MCGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join the community of Franklin, Massachusetts in honoring Dr. Richard Warren for his 30 years of outstanding service to the Franklin Public School System and other districts throughout New England.

After receiving his bachelors' degree from Bryant College in 1964, Dr. Warren earned his Masters of Educational Administration and Supervision at Rhode Island College in 1973; his Certificate of Advanced Study at the University of Connecticut in 1978; and his Ph.D. in Education Administration at the University of Connecticut in 1980.

During his 30-plus years of service to public education in Franklin and New England, Dr. Warren has distinguished himself as both an educator and administrator. Whether it be as an elementary school teacher for the public school districts of Tiverton, Rhode Island and Fall River, Massachusetts; Supervising Principal for Scituate Public Schools of Scituate, Rhode Island; or Superintendent of Schools for Franklin, Ayer, Mansfield and Dartmouth School Districts in Massachusetts, Dr. Warren has maintained his life-long commitment to educating the children of our community.

Furthermore, Dr. Warren's passion and dedication to learning has never been confined to the classroom. He has served as Associate Director of the Northeast Community Education Development Center and Research-Associate for the Department of Education Administration at the University of Connecticut; Director of Community Services for Fall River Public Schools in Fall River, Massachusetts; and Coordinator of the Title I Extended School Day program. It is clear that Dr. Warren's passion and enthusiasm for education has rewarded not only the children of our public schools, but also our entire community.

Although Dr. Warren is retiring to spend more time with his wife, Linda; daughters, Lisa and Barbara; and his grandchildren, he intends to be active as an educational consultant. In his personal time, Dr. Warren enjoys music and gardening.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my fellow members of U.S. House of Representatives to join me in congratulating Dr. Warren for all that he has done for the community of Franklin and other communities throughout Massachusetts and New England. He has served us well, and I wish him the best of luck in all future endeavors.

OF COLORADO

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. SCHAFFER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize Captain Dan Marshall of Greeley, Colorado. Captain Marshall has demonstrated exemplary leadership at the Air Force's 137th Space Warning Squadron in Greeley. For this, Mr. Speaker, the United States Congress commends Captain Marshall and wishes him the best of luck.

Throughout his career, Captain Marshall has accumulated such honors as being top of his class at USAF Undergraduate Space Training at Vandenberg Air Force Base in 1998 and having top qualifications as MGS Field Commander and Main Operating Base OTC. Captain Marshall is rated "Highly Qualified" in Space Operations, which is the best U.S. Space Command rating given by the military. In addition, Dan is a highly skilled pilot having earned his Bachelor of Science degree in Aviation at Metropolitan State College in Denver, Colorado. Dan's continued service is admirable and greatly appreciated by his fellow Coloradans, Americans and me.

The United States military is vital to the future and national security of our great Nation, and the citizens of this country are indebted to Captain Marshall. His rank and educational achievements speak for themselves. Dan is a fine example to the youth of America and to all who share his devotion to our country.

As a citizen of Colorado's Fourth Congressional District, Captain Marshall is truly a positive role model for the youth of America. Dan's community, state and country are proud of him. I ask the House to join me in extending our appreciation and well wishes to Captain Dan Marshall.

of the Polish American Congress sponsored a memorial service to remember those who lost their lives during the tragic Katyn Forest Massacre sixty-two years ago, and those killed during the attack on America, September 11, 2001. The service was held at the Katyn Monument site in Jersey City, New Jersey, on September 15, 2002.

After Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union maliciously invaded Poland in 1939, the Polish citizenry fought bravely against both adversaries on two fronts. Unfortunately, in the process of valiantly defending their homeland, over fifteen thousand Polish soldiers, officers, intellectual leaders, prisoners of war, and other Polish citizens were brutally murdered. Perhaps one of the most unforgettable acts committed by the Soviet Union against Poland was later uncovered with the discovery of 4,500 bodies found in a single mass grave at the Katyn forest, near Smolensk in the Soviet Union. This horrendous discovery became known as the Katyn Forest Massacre.

And in an egregious attack against humanity, over three thousand Americans and citizens representing more than 80 nationalities were lost at the World Trade Center, the Pentagon, and the fields of Somerset County, Pennsylvania, on September 11, 2001. The heinous attacks on American soil reaffirmed our commitment to Democracy in defense of a free and open society, threatened by evil, injustice, hatred, and tyranny.

Today, I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring the lives lost in these tragedies. We shall never forget these acts of barbarism. And we shall never forget the innocent lives lost as we strive, as a People, to create a peaceful world.

SEPTEMBER 6, 2002: A TIME TO MOURN

HON. MIKE PENCE

OF INDIANA

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, the good book tells us that there is a time for every purpose under heaven. There is a time to weep and a time to mourn. On September 6th I joined some 250 of my colleagues in this body as we traveled to Federal Hall in New York City to do just that.

We gathered at a place in which this Congress met and even adopted the Bill of Rights in 1789. We mourned with those who mourn and we wept with those who weep. The last time I was in New York City was September 21, 2001. I stood in the ashes and on the periphery of the devastation at Ground Zero and I expect tomorrow, as we all do, to be a deeply moving day emotionally.

As we join to pray, Mr. Speaker, let us ever remember that we are also told that there is a time for peace and there is a time for war. As we pray for the bereaved let us also pray for wisdom for our President and our leadership in this institution as we choose the times and the days ahead for war.

He was an auditor with the U.S. Department of Treasury, Office of Inspector General, and for the past 22 years, was a devoted member of the EPA/OIG staff where he was the Audit Manager in the Boston office since 1988. ## TRIBUTE TO JERRY MORGENSEN

HON. BOB SCHAFFER

OF COLORADO

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. SCHAFFER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize Mr. Jerry Morgensen, President and CEO of Hensel Phelps Construction in Greeley, Colorado. After the devastating attack on our Nation last September, Mr. Morgensen and his company were hired to rebuild the scarred west face of the Pentagon. Tonight, he is being awarded the Air Force Association's John R. Alison Award in recognition of his outstanding industrial leadership while renovating and rebuilding the home of our defense department.

Jerry Morgensen is a man who has served his country well during one of its darkest hours. Due to his innovation and leadership, he and a team of dedicated men and women were able to rebuild the Pentagon in less than one year, defying the terrorists and fostering a sense of healing in the citizens who watched the building's dramatic transformation. I am proud of the tremendous work Mr. Morgensen has done, not only to rebuild the Pentagon, but to reinvigorate our national spirit.

A citizen of Colorado's Fourth Congressional District, Jerry Morgensen is truly a great American. I ask the House to join me in extending our sincere thanks and warmest congratulations to Mr. Jerry Morgensen.

IN MEMORY OF STEVEN SNYDER, CHAMPION OF THE PERSECUTED

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, on August 27, 2002, one of the leading advocates for the persecuted passed away. His name was Rev. Steven Snyder and I knew him well. Steve cared as much as anyone I know for the persecuted. His efforts and labor on behalf of the voiceless and the persecuted, raised awareness of cases and problems in far away places that few would have known without his voice. Mr. Speaker, I will insert following these remarks an article from the Washington Times which describes how Steve made such a difference with his life.

Steven was the founder and president of International Christian Concern, an organization dedicated to raise awareness of and to advocate for the plight of persecuted Christians around the world. Prior to founding International Christian Concern, Steve was the director of Christian Solidarity International, where he also was a strong and vocal advocate for the persecuted.

Steve was a pioneer in exposing to the world the horrible persecution and brutality that is occurring to people just because of their religious beliefs. Steve's efforts and his voice resounded in the halls of power throughout the world. His advocacy and speaking out on the persecuted, influenced Members of Congress and government officials from around the world to intervene and become involved in what would have otherwise been unknown issues.

In order to see and learn first-hand of persecution, Steve risked his life many times by personally traveling to very dangerous parts of the world, where he not only was a witness to human rights abuses, but where he also brought hope and love to the suffering.

Steve was a remarkable man who did incredible things in his 53 years for the suffering all over the world. Steve will be sorely missed. He deserves the words from Matthew 25, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

We send our condolences to his wife Connie and four children Sarah de Vuyst, Lori Slaubaugh, Joshua Snyder and Sean Snyder.

SNYDER DIES AT 53; ADVOCATED CHRISTIAN FREEDOM ABROAD
(By Larry Witham)

The Rev. Steven L. Snyder, a tireless global traveler and advocate for voiceless Christians abroad who faced religious persecution under communist and Islamic regimes, died Monday night of an infection. He was 53.

The evangelical minister, a native of the San Diego area, began his advocacy work as the U.S. director of Christian Solidarity International, which in the 1980s focused on persecution under communism. In 1995, he founded International Christian Concern to extend the work to Islamic countries.

The Silver Spring resident and father of four was acknowledged yesterday as a pioneer voice on the topic of Christian persecution when it was not high on Washington's human rights agenda.

Mr. Snyder also took risks to penetrate such countries as Sudan, Vietnam, Cuba, Saudi Arabia, Indonesia, China and Pakistan to bring out accurate information, documents and video footage of underground churches or persecuted minorities.

"He was a faithful servant of people persecuted for their faith," said U.S. Ambassador at Large for Religious Liberty John V. Hanford III, who had met and worked with Mr. Snyder in 1985. "He stayed with it despite the constant discouragement that comes with human rights work."

"Steven labored in this vineyard long before the movement against persecution captured the imagination of evangelicals," said the Rev. Richard Cizik, Washington director of the National Association of Evangelicals. "What a faithful friend he was of the persecuted."

Friends and human-rights workers who knew Mr. Snyder noted his on-the-ground work, desire to highlight those who suffered rather than himself, and a kind of perpetual sad look in his eyes from seeing such grim events abroad—and so little interest at home.

"When not many people cared about this issue, he worked at it faithfully and strenuously," said Paul Marshall, a scholar of religion with Freedom House. "He didn't just report, he went to dangerous places. He did his research with his boots on."

Dr. David Harding, a family physician who is on the six-member board of International Christian Concern, traveled to Indonesia with Mr. Snyder in November to provide medical aid to Christians being persecuted by Muslims on the island of Sulawesi.

"Steven is going to be very difficult to replace," Dr. Harding said. "He made every effort to get the facts right, and he had a way of finding all the right people and getting at the truth of a situation."

Pat Bradley, a St. Louis businessman who first met Mr. Snyder in 1999, recalls their two-week fact-finding trip to Sudan in February 2000.

"For two days we drove into the south from Uganda on what we thought was the bumpiest road in the world, until we got to Sudan's roads," Mr. Bradley said. "Between us we had seen bad places, but by far this was the worst."

It was 105-degree bush country, he said. "These people had literally nothing. No food or clothing. They were victims of a scorched-earth policy, and some were tortured."

On return from Sudan in 2000, Mr. Snyder drafted a detailed report for Capitol Hill and the State Department, and made it available to news organizations.

During a trip to China in 1999, Mr. Snyder brought in Bibles and met with leaders of the underground church. Some of the people who went to hear his presentations remember the vivid images and footage he brought back of nighttime river baptisms.

Staff at the State Department yesterday also took the news with sorrow. One staffer asked a reporter whether Mr. Snyder had worked at State because everybody knew him.

"Steve was a foot soldier for religious freedom," said Tom Phar, director of international religious liberty at the State Department. "He traveled the world working on behalf of people being persecuted for their faith. He was an effective advocate and a good friend."

On Monday afternoon, Mr. Snyder was rushed to the Holy Cross Hospital emergency room with a high fever, and friends recall that because the diagnosis was severe he asked them to "pray for a miracle." He died about 7:45 p.m.

Mr. Snyder lost his spleen in an operation six years ago, and doctors said that weakened his ability to fight the infection, which rapidly taxed his entire system.

He is survived by his wife, Connie Snyder of Silver Spring, and four children: Sarah de Vuyst of Ukraine; Lori Slaubaugh of Rollin, N.D.; Joshua Snyder of Boulder, Colo.; and Sean, 16.

Visitations may be made tomorrow from 2 to 4 p.m. and from 7 to 9 p.m. at Collins Funeral Home at 500 University Blvd. W. in Silver Spring. A funeral service will be held 10 a.m. Saturday at Immanuel's Church at 16819 New Hampshire Ave. in Silver Spring.

In lieu of flowers, the family asked that donations "to help the persecuted church" be sent to International Christian Concern, 2020 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, Box 941, Washington, DC 20006-1846.

IN RECOGNITION OF FAIRLAWN REHABILITATION HOSPITAL

HON. JAMES P. MCGOVERN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. MCGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of Fairlawn Rehabilitation Hospital in my hometown of Worcester, Massachusetts. In 1987, Fairlawn served as a small acute community hospital. However, over a period of time it has evolved into the first facility in the United States to fully convert into a rehabilitation provider. Currently, an average of 100 inpatients and 100 outpatients are treated everyday to help people reach their fullest potential to make for a joyful and productive life.

Fairlawn Rehabilitation Hospital is in joint collaboration with the Fallon Clinic, UMASS Memorial Health Center, and HEALTHSOUTH Corporation. Fairlawn Rehabilitation Hospital specializes in many rehab programs: brain injury, orthopedics, geriatrics, stroke, spinal cord injury, pulmonary, amputee, neurological cardiac, and burns are included. The incredible care and dedication to the patients' of Fairlawn Rehabilitation Hospital is to be commended.

Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, September 19, 2002, Fairlawn Rehabilitation Hospital celebrates its Fifteenth Anniversary. #### IN MEMORY OF ADEL A. ZAKHARY

HON. ROBERT MENENDEZ

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. MENENDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to remember Adel A. Zakhary, a friend and neighbor to many, who lost his life in the World Trade Center tragedy on September 11, 2001. A memorial service took place in his honor on Saturday, September 14, 2002, at Saint George Catholic Orthodox Church in Jersey City.

An immigrant from Egypt, Adel lived the American dream, making America his home with his wife, Nagat, son, George, and daughter, Mariam. He was dedicated and tireless in his work, and in providing for his family. On September 11, he went to work on the 92nd floor of Tower One of the World Trade Center, as he had done for 18 years.

In one of the most unforgivable acts against humanity, over three thousand people were lost at the World Trade Center, the Pentagon, and the fields of Somerset County, Pennsylvania, on September 11, 2001. Adel was among those individuals who were tragically lost. The horrific attacks have strengthened us in our resolve to fight evil and intolerance in pursuit of freedom, justice, and democracy.

Today, I ask my colleagues to join me in remembering Adel A. Zakhary, a loving husband and father, who will never be forgotten. Let us join together not only to grieve this tremendous loss, but also to celebrate the remarkable accomplishments in his life. I extend my deepest sympathies to the family and friends of Adel.

HONORING MARTHA EZELL
"MAMA" TUNE FOR A LIFETIME OF ACHIEVEMENT

HON. BOB CLEMENT

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Martha Ezell Tune, "Mama Tune," of Antioch, Tennessee, for a lifetime of devotion to family, faith, and community.

Mama Tune's contributions to Davidson County, and particularly, the Antioch area, have impacted many. Whether it be her involvement and leadership in civic matters, cooking meals for family and friends, working the polls on election day, writing a history of the Antioch community, or substitute teaching at Antioch High School, Mama Tune is an individual who is an inspiration to us all.

A Tennessee native, Mama Tune graduated from Antioch High School in 1941, alongside her brother, James. That same year she married James Tune. The two enjoyed 50 years together and had two children, Buford and Sam, and three grandchildren. Mama Tune's sons are successful Middle Tennessee business owners.

Tune received her education from Middle Tennessee Teacher's College and the University of Alabama. She taught at Una Elementary School for several years. She has been teaching in the Metropolitan Davidson County School System as a teacher or substitute teacher for fifty years and currently substitutes at Antioch High School on a regular basis. Many times she teaches students whose parents she once taught in school. Her profound influence for the good has shaped many lives over the years.

Mama Tune often touts the accomplishments of the students she taught at Antioch. She pours more than knowledge into their lives: she pours love and they do not ever forget it.

The Clement family has known and appreciated the friendship of the Tune and Ezell families for a number of years. In particular, we have enjoyed many conversations and meals at their home, including such southern delicacies as homemade chocolate pie, cornbread, green beans, fried chicken, and macaroni and cheese. Mama Tune is well known for her cooking and included a number of her best-loved recipes in the book, "All I Know About Antioch High School, The Town, and My Life."

Individuals like Mama Tune are those who make this nation great—individuals who are willing to give of themselves and their time for the betterment of the state and the community through acts of kindness and love. Today we honor her for a lifetime of achievement.

EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF CON-GRESS ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF TERRORIST ATTACKS LAUNCHED AGAINST THE
UNITED STATES ON SEPTEMBER
11, 2001

SPEECH OF

HON. DAVE CAMP

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 2002

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this Joint Resolution and in doing so, I stand in solemn remembrance of the tragic events of a year ago and a pride in America's response.

While the loss of life was immense, and the impact of the terrorist attacks was felt far from New York, Washington, D.C., and Pennsylvania, the terrorists failed. The group of men, and the larger organization they represented, wanted to break the will of a proud and strong country. The world stands in witness to their failure.

Instead of falling apart, our country united. Our brave first responders worked tirelessly to help survivors; we saw ordinary citizens involved in heroic efforts; and all across the country Americans joined together to offer assistance.

The outpouring of support and unity could be seen in every flag that was flown with pride across this country. The United States of America rose to the challenge presented to it with a resolve that was felt around the world.

Now, on our first Patriot Day, when we see our flag at half-mast, let us not only remember the tragic events of a year ago, but also the strength exhibited by all Americans. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution, expressing solidarity on this day of remembrance.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS FOR SENIORS

HON. ADAM B. SCHIFF

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. SCHIFF. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of millions of seniors across our nation who are forced to choose between buying their food, paying their rent, or purchasing their medicine. For too many seniors, this is truly a life or death situation that none of them should have to face.

Unfortunately, this Congress is just weeks away from adjourning for the session and we are still no closer to enacting a Medicare prescription drug benefit.

Over two months ago, we had an opportunity to debate and vote on a bill that would provide a meaningful prescription drug benefit under the Medicare program. The "Medicare Rx Drug Benefit and Discount Act (H.R. 5019)" would add a new "Part D" to the Medicare program with voluntary prescription drug coverage for any senior that chooses to enroll. Participating seniors would pay a set $25 per month premium and a $100 a year deductible. In return, Medicare would cover 80% of all drug costs up to $2,000 a year. Once a senior reached the $2,000 out-of-pocket limit, Medicare would then pay for all drug costs beyond that point.

The House leadership refused to allow this bill on the floor. Instead, in the dead of night, while our nation's seniors were fast asleep, a majority in the House passed a bill that might as well have been written by the pharmaceutical industry. No substitute was allowed and no amendments could be offered. There was nothing even remotely bipartisan about that evening.

The bill that passed at 2:30 a.m. on June 28 does not establish a prescription drug plan under Medicare. Instead, it relies on private insurers who are free to design their own plans, charge their own prices, decide which drugs to cover, and tell our seniors what pharmacies they may use. It does nothing to bring down rising drug costs nor does it address the issue of reimportation. Most importantly, the House leadership knows this bill has no chance of passing the Senate. It was a political gesture, not a policy priority.

Where does this leave our nation's seniors? They are still being forced to choose between food, shelter, and their medicine. They are still paying exorbitant prices for the same medications that are available in Canada and overseas for a fraction of the cost. They are still waiting for this House to act in a responsible manner.

My House colleagues on both sides of the aisle, we still have time—it is not too late. Let's work together in a bipartisan manner to meet our parties' respective promises to the American people and provide meaningful prescription drug benefits. Together we can bring hope and relief to our nation's seniors and pass a real Medicare prescription drug plan before this Congress adjourns.

THE NATIONAL INSTITUTES OF HEALTH SECURITY ACT

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge support for The National Institutes of Health (NIH) Security Act.

The National Institutes of Health, founded in 1887, is one of the world's foremost medical research centers, and the Federal focal point for medical research in the U.S. Comprised of 27 separate components, mainly Institutes and Centers, NIH has in excess of 75 buildings on more than 300 acres in Bethesda, Maryland.

The research centers at NIH study some of the most infectious diseases in the world, including anthrax, smallpox and West Nile virus, as well as nuclear waste and radioactive material. Unfortunately, because of the work NIH does, they present a prime target for terrorists that wish to do America harm. Therefore, it must be a paramount goal of this Congress to ensure that NIH can protect itself against an attack. Presently, NIH does not have the ability to do so.

After September 11, Congress authorized the 322-acre biomedical research facility to bolster its security by doubling its police ranks from 64 officers to 108. This decision was made by U.S. intelligence experts who determined that the NIH campus is vulnerable and a potential target for terrorist attack and/or infiltration and theft of protected materials and research. Unfortunately, the force has never reached such heights due to its current pay and retirement system.

NIH police are one of the lowest paid in the Washington-Metropolitan area. The minimum salary for NIH police, $26,415, falls thousands short of what's offered by some federal agencies, and even by some local police departments. Making matters worse, NIH police are not classified as federal "law enforcement officers," and are thereby denied the superior retirement benefits that distinction affords. The result is in low retention of officers and difficulty with recruitment. Without retirements included, there exists a 77 percent attrition rate at NIH yearly. Currently, the force has faced such problems with officer retention and recruitment that by June, its numbers had dwindled to about 50.

Due to the severity of the situation and the resources that NIH protects, I am introducing legislation that would allow NIH to bolster its security force. This bill would add no additional costs to the federal government, it would simply allow some long overdue flexibility to be used by NIH. This would include:

Making NIH Police "Federal Law Enforcement Officers," which allows their officers who are doing the same essential work as other "law enforcement officers" to receive commensurate salaries and retirement pay.

Allowing NIH police to carry firearms, serve warrants and subpoenas, and make arrests without warrant for any offense against the U.S.

Conducting investigations within the U.S. for offenses committed on property occupied by NIH.

Without these changes, we are undoubtedly allowing a prime target to remain vulnerable to terrorists. Protecting the 4-million square foot research hospital, the third largest federal building in the world, must be a priority of this Congress and I urge support for this legislation.

During his prestigious years as President, Mr. Stanley has built an organization that is financially strong and well respected throughout the state of West Virginia. HONORING SANTA BARBARA COUNTY SUPERINTENDENT BILL CIRONE

HON. LOIS CAPPS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mrs. CAPPS. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to the Santa Barbara County Superintendent of Schools, Bill Cirone. I have known Bill for many years, dating back to the days when I was a school nurse in the Santa Barbara County schools, and I am very pleased to have the opportunity to honor him today.

On October 3, 2002, the Emmaus of Santa Barbara will present the 2002 Richard Breza Service to Santa Barbara Award to Bill Cirone. I can think of no more deserving person than Bill to receive this award, as he has served Santa Barbara County Schools for the past 20 years in his position as Superintendent. Bill has created the nationally acclaimed Santa Barbara "Center for Community Education and Citizen Participation" and has constantly emphasized the importance of community service in our schools. Bill has served on the board of directors or advisory committees for many organizations, including the University of California at Santa Barbara Gevirtz Research Center, the National Association of Partners in Education, the Santa Barbara Industry Education Council, the Santa Barbara Foundation, the Thomas Jefferson Center for Character Education and the Santa Barbara Grand Opera Association.

Santa Barbara's County Schools are truly a product of Bill's creativity and passion for excellence. He has influenced the lives of thousands of children, their parents, and community members as a whole. It is always refreshing to see Bill at community events, as he serves as an example of someone who cares so deeply about our children's futures. There are so many extraordinary people on California's central coast, but there is no doubt that there is a special place in my heart for Bill Cirone.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to pay tribute to our wonderful Superintendent on this glorious occasion.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE PRAIRIE ROSE CHAPTER OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION SALUTES
CONSTITUTION WEEK

HON. DENNIS MOORE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, the week of September 17–23 has been officially designated as Constitution Week under Public Law 105–225. This marks the 215th anniversary of the signing of our Constitution.

The guardian of our liberties, our Constitution established our republic as a self-governing nation dedicated to rule by law. This document is the cornerstone of our freedom. It was written to protect every American from the abuse of power by government. Without that restraint, our founders believed the republic would perish.

The ideals upon which our Constitution is based are reinforced each day by the success of our political system to which it gave birth. The success of our way of government requires an enlightened citizenry.

Constitution Week provides an opportunity for all Americans to recall the achievements of our founders, the nature of limited government, and the rights, privileges and responsibilities of citizenship. It provides the opportunity to be better informed about our rights, freedoms and duties as citizens.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I particularly want to take note of the outstanding work of the Prairie Rose Chapter of the Kansas Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, which is actively involved in the Third Congressional District in events this week commemorating Constitution Week. The Prairie Rose Chapter has been involved with this effort in our communities for a number of years and I commend them for doing so.

Our Constitution has served us well for over 200 years, but it will continue as a strong, vibrant, and vital foundation for freedom only so long as the American people remain dedicated to the basic principles on which it rests. Thus, as the United States continues into its third century of constitutional democracy, let us renew our commitment to, in the words of our Constitution's preamble: "form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity . . ." I know that the Prairie Rose Chapter of the Kansas Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution joins with me in urging all Americans to renew their commitment to, and understanding of, our Constitution, particularly during our current time of crisis, when Americans have been attacked on our own soil by terrorists who do not recognize the rule of human law.

He earned his Master's Degree in Hospital Administration at Washington University in St. Louis in 1966 and completed his residency in hospital administration at Hillcrest Medical Center in Tulsa, Oklahoma. Prior to his arrival at Memorial Hermann, Mr. Wilford served in various administrative capacities for 20 years. He was associated with Hillcrest Medical Center in Tulsa for 10 years in addition to serving as president of North Mississippi Health Services in Tupelo, Mississippi from 1974 to 1984.

Through his commitment to these organizations, Mr. Wilford has set himself apart as a leader and activist in the health care community.

His dedication to the health care profession has lead many acclaimed institutions to recognize Mr. Wilford's achievements. In 1995, he was the recipient of the Washington University Health Administration Program Distinguished Alumnus Award, received an honorary Doctorate of Laws degree from Houston Baptist University and was named Business Leader of the Year in Fort Bend County, Texas. HONORING DR. NOEL SMITH OF WACO, TEXAS, A TRUE UNSUNG HERO

HON. CHET EDWARDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a great Texan, Dr. Noel Smith of Waco, who had the vision for an independent public television station in Central Texas. Earning a Ph.D. in Distance Learning from Texas A&M University, Dr. Smith rose to become the Chair of the Telecommunications Department at Central Texas College in Waco, where he effectively used his talents as teacher, mentor, and counselor to improve the lives of many Texans.

It was at Central Texas College that Dr. Smith became actively involved in his lifelong commitment to KCTF Television. In its early days as a stand-alone station, KCTF experienced more problems than shining moments. But in 1994, when its owners withdrew support for the station, Dr. Smith rallied a committed group of Waco citizens who convinced the Chancellor and Trustees of Central Texas College to sell them the license.

Once Dr. Smith's group bought the license, the hard work began. It was as though everyone at the station was performing on a high wire without a net. Yet somehow, Dr. Smith stayed faithful to the vision of creating a community public television station and, thankfully, his vision became a reality. Brazos Valley Public Broadcasting, as it was now called, was born. KCTF would eventually become KWBU, and KWBU would expand to include public radio. Dr. Smith articulated his vision in the KWBU Mission Statement:

"KWBU shall serve as an essential lifelong resource providing quality public television and radio programs and services for the enrichment of the lives of the residents of McLennan County."

Mr. Speaker, Not many ideas make it from vision to reality. But this one has because Noel Smith has worked tirelessly to ensure that public television in Central Texas achieves that mission.

In his professional life, Dr. Noel Smith has held many national positions of leadership that have contributed to the growth of public broadcasting. He served with distinction on the board of directors of the Southern Educational Communications Association, now the National Educational Telecommunications Association, and he was a member of the PBS Board of Directors. He has used his leadership to effectively represent the interests of small market licensees.

During the course of his career, Dr. Smith has accomplished a tremendous amount of good. In addition to leading the growth of KWBU, Dr. Noel Smith is an ordained Baptist minister, and certainly appreciates the many blessings in his life, including a long marriage to his wife Judy, his three wonderful daughters and numerous grandchildren.

This story does not end on the expected happy note. At this writing, Noel is very ill. But something of Noel Smith will always be a part of KWBU and public broadcasting in Central Texas.

I ask all of my colleagues to join me in honoring and celebrating the life and accomplishments of an unsung hero, Dr. Noel Smith of Waco, Texas. The people of my District are better off today because of his commitment to turn his vision for public television into reality.

HONORING FRESNO CITY FIRE

HON. GEORGE RADANOVICH

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. RADANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the Fresno City Fire Department for their devotion to protecting the citizens and community of Fresno. The year 2002 marks the 125th Anniversary of the Fresno City Fire Department, which will be celebrated at the 4th Annual Fresno City Firefighters' Chili Cook-Off on September 14th, 2002 at California State University of Fresno.

In 1877, Leopold Gundelfinger and other citizens formed a Hook and Ladder Company in order to protect the city from fires. Unfortunately, in 1882, fire destroyed the original Hook and Ladder Company, but was replaced by dedicated volunteers who were named "Fresno Alert No. 1." The Fresno Fire Department was officially created in 1902 and has protected a large portion of the Central Valley ever since. In 1984, a grant was established to create a community volunteer fire prevention program called "Burn Aware." The goals of the volunteers were to implement and create a wide spread network of fire prevention programs.

In 2002, the Fresno City Fire Department received national praise for its inventive and advanced approach to alternate methods of providing municipal fire protection. This fire protection agency has the highest ideals in providing fire protection service and is a leader in California. The special occasion will include a chili-tasting contest among fire departments from throughout the Valley, live rescue demonstrations, and fun for the entire family.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to honor the Fresno City Fire Department for their dedicated and selfless service to the Central Valley. I urge my colleagues to join me in wishing this organization many more years of continued success.

HONORING LEVITOWN'S 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JAMES C. GREENWOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today to commemorate the golden anniversary of a community in my district that revolutionized suburban living in America: Levittown, Pennsylvania. In honor of this anniversary, I would like to submit the following proclamation for the record:

Whereas Levittown, Bucks County, Pennsylvania, was created fifty years ago, beginning with twenty families who moved into their homes on June 23, 1952;

Whereas this benchmark in American housing resulted from the collaboration of attorney Abraham Levitt and his sons, architect Alfred S. Levitt and businessman William J. Levitt;

Whereas William Levitt's innovative mass-production technique resulted in 17,000 affordable homes that were constructed at a record pace;

Whereas these new and vibrant neighborhoods were spread among the Bucks County municipalities of Falls, Middletown, and Bristol Townships, and Tullytown Borough;

Whereas Levitt created not only the prototypical suburban home with its spacious interiors and fully landscaped exteriors, but he also designed entire neighborhoods that grew into coherent communities;

Whereas Levittown became the realization of the American Dream for thousands of families, many of who served their country during the Second World War;

Whereas Levittown has evolved into the quintessential example of America's melting pot middle class, as it houses a diverse population of ethnicities and religious traditions;

Be it resolved, therefore, that the U.S. House of Representatives recognize the fiftieth anniversary of Levittown, an anniversary that marks an epochal achievement in American housing.

In addition to achieving seven Northern Conference Championships with his basketball team, he remains a respected member of the Section 2 Basketball Committee since 1955. His skills and dedication to his players further continued in track. In this sport Mr. Luciano successfully coached his team to fifteen Northern Conference Dual Meet Championships, nine Northern Conference Invitation Meet Championships, seven Section 2 Class B Championships and five Washington County Invitation Championships. I am proud to mention he has since been inducted into both the Glens Falls Heritage Hall of Fame and the New York State Basketball Hall of Fame for his outstanding achievements.

Mr. Luciano has truly set standards for excellence in his profession and service to the community. His extraordinary charity and kindness has not gone unnoticed locally. Mr. DEUTSCH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a friend and distinguished citizen of Florida, Mr. Chesterfield Smith. Chesterfield Smith's inspiring dedication to our judicial system, social commitment to the legal profession, and remarkable personal and professional accomplishments serve as a model of American achievement. I rise today to congratulate him on his most recent accolade, the 2002 Justice Award from the Judicature Society.

Founded in 1913, the American Judicature Society (AJS) is a prestigious national, non-partisan organization of judges, lawyers, and non-lawyers dedicated to promoting the effective administration of justice. #### CELEBRATING THE 85TH ANNIVERSARY OF ST. ELPIS GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH

HON. J. RANDY FORBES

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. FORBES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate St. Elpis Greek Orthodox Church of Hopewell, Virginia on its 85th anniversary.

In 1914, Dupont Chemicals decided to expand their plant in Hopewell in support of WWI. Consequently, ads were posted throughout Europe to recruit immigrants as laborers and engineers for this plant. About 6000 Greeks responded to this ad with the promise of a new future in America. Upon arrival in Hopewell, these Greeks sought to preserve their heritage and religion by building the first Greek Orthodox Church in Virginia.

The tremendous sacrifice made by these early parishioners to establish St. Elpis was great. Their devotion and commitment to preserving their Greek heritage and religion enabled the parishioners to overcome great obstacles over the years and has enabled the church to continue to thrive. This spirit is as vibrant today as it was 85 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate St. Elpis and its parishioners, as they celebrate the 85th anniversary of the founding of their church and I wish them continued success and prosperity in the years to come. It is truly an honor and a privilege to recognize St. Elpis in the United States House of Representatives this day.

TRIBUTE TO THE MITRE CORPORATION IN HUNTSVILLE, ALABAMA

HON. ROBERT E. (BUD) CRAMER, JR.

OF ALABAMA

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the MITRE Corporation in celebration of twenty years in Huntsville, Alabama. As you know, the MITRE Corporation is a private, independent, not-for-profit organization that provides government agencies with technical support that is not available through the government or contractor community.

For 2 decades, the Army, NASA, and Department of Defense programs headquartered at Redstone Arsenal have relied on the MITRE Corporation's Huntsville Site Office for objective technical expertise. Since the MITRE Corporation cannot manufacture products or compete with the industry, the support it provides Redstone Arsenal is in alignment with the government's objectives and free from competitive pressures.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the MITRE Corporation for 20 years of excellent service to the North Alabama defense and NASA community. In 1982, this Site Office began with one person and now employs a staff of 33. On this milestone anniversary celebration, I send the employees of the MITRE Corporation my thanks and wish them many more years of success in Huntsville, Alabama.

IN RECOGNITION OF LAWRENCE LIVERMORE NATIONAL LABORATORY ON THE OCCASION OF ITS 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. ELLEN O. TAUSCHER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mrs. TAUSCHER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and its staff for their outstanding contributions to science and to the security of our Nation throughout the past 50 years.

The Laboratory was established in 1952 to help meet an urgent national security need and has made numerous advances to keep the Nation at peace and secure.

Lawrence Livermore, Los Alamos, and Sandia National Laboratories developed the nuclear weapons that have deterred world wars. The labs are ensuring the continuing safety, security, and reliability of our Nation's nuclear weapons stockpile in the absence of nuclear testing.

Breakthroughs at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory led to the development of the high-yield warheads that greatly contributed to strategic deterrence throughout the Cold War.

The Laboratory has provided technical support to arms control negotiations and treaty implementation, including negotiations and treaties to reduce the size of nuclear arsenals, prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons and technologies, and limit nuclear weapons testing.

The Laboratory has greatly contributed to efforts of the United States intelligence community to understand nuclear weapons-related activities worldwide, and today is using its capabilities to defend our nation against terrorism.

The Laboratory is also a leader in science and has worked on technologies to provide us with long term energy security.

The Laboratory has developed environmental restoration technologies that are being used to rapidly clean up groundwater contamination at Superfund sites and is developing simulation capabilities to better understand changes in the earth's climate.

The Laboratory is identifying the source of genetic diseases and developing improved detectors of biological agents.

Livermore scientists produced work that won a Nobel Prize for Physics in 1998 and numerous advances in astrophysics.

Technology development at the Laboratory has broadly contributed to the Nation's technical prowess and the competitiveness of United States industry, as evidenced by the winning of 85 prestigious R&D 100 awards.

Lastly, the Laboratory contributes broadly to higher education, as well as elementary and secondary educational efforts throughout Northern California and educational outreach directed at minority groups nationwide.

On its 50th anniversary, I would like to congratulate the Laboratory, its staff, and former employees for their dedicated service to our Nation, outstanding contributions to national security, a strong tradition of scientific and technical excellence, and continuing efforts to make the world more secure and a better place to live.

PAYING TRIBUTE TO: SALVADOR
A. LOPEZ

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct privilege to recognize Mr. Salvador A. Lopez of Glade Park, Colorado for the selfless act of courage he displayed last March of 2002. On September 18, Mr. Lopez will be awarded the prestigious Special Carrier Alert Award from the National Association of Letter Carriers, and as he receives his award, I would like to pay tribute to his extraordinary act of courage. Mr. Lopez is a letter carrier for the U.S. Postal Service in Grand Junction, Colorado, where he has worked for the last 28 years. Not too long ago, while he was busy delivering mail along his route, Mr. Lopez noticed a runaway car with a child inside who was too young to take control of the vehicle. Mr. Lopez hurriedly ran alongside of the car, jumped into the car window, and pulled the emergency brake. Fortunately, Mr. Lopez was able to stop the vehicle before the car drove into a busy intersection which could have brought certain injury to himself and the child. Due to Mr. Lopez's quick thinking and heroic actions, the child only suffered minor bruises, while Mr. Lopez escaped with three broken ribs. Last April, the Carnegie Hero Fund honored Mr. Lopez with one of its 23 nationally recognized awards for his heroism. Tomorrow, he will be recognized again by the National Association of Letter Carriers for his courageous actions here in Washington D.C. The true magnitude of his bravery can only be fully illustrated by the fact that the child whom he saved, Nicholas Reyes, will have the opportunity to reach his full potential.

Mr. Speaker, it is a distinct honor to recognize Mr. Salvador A. Lopez before this body of Congress and this nation for his bravery and composure in a time of adversity. Mr. Lopez's courage is an example of what all Americans throughout the country are capable of demonstrating when faced with extraordinary circumstances. Congratulations on your achievement, Salvador, and good luck in your future endeavors.

TRIBUTE TO MR. DAVE MANEY

HON. SAXBY CHAMBLISS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. CHAMBLISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Mr. Dave Maney of Augusta, Georgia. Mr. Maney is Experience Works' 2001 Older Worker of the Year for the State of Georgia.

As a Marketing Representative with the Department of Labor Career Center in Georgia, Mr. Maney changes the downhill direction of the unemployed every day. His job is to motivate, encourage and inspire clients into believing in their ability to find and keep a job. The way Mr. Maney describes his job is . . . "Most of my clients, and there have been more than 600 this year, seldom set goals, and when they do, they are not high enough. I teach them that goals have to be higher than anything they have ever done."

His goals in life have been simple. "The keys to my success and to the life I have had to this point have been a positive attitude, a great wife and wonderful home life, and loving interaction with people."

That interaction with people, especially those who are labeled non-custodial parents, and food stamp recipients, has added tremendous value to both his life and work. From his first job as a custodian at Montgomery Ward, to his service in the Korean Conflict, raising six children, and surviving cancer, Mr. Maney has had a full and challenging life. "With all I've been through I would still say that giving people self-worth and hope for a better tomorrow is my proudest accomplishment," says Mr. Maney.

Mr. Speaker, due to the events of last September we were not able to honor Mr. Maney for his accomplishments. I hope that you will join me today to do so.

CUBAN POLITICAL PRISONERS
INITIATIVE—SENATE OPENING

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, today, Americans for a Free Cuba gathered on the Senate steps to officially open the Cuban Political Prisoners Initiative display in the Senate Russell Office Building. They will be storming the halls of the US Senate tomorrow, urging Senators not to vote for lifting the travel ban on Cuba.

The Business and Agricultural communities have used their vast resources to make their case for lifting sanctions on Cuba at a summit here in Washington, but we know that their case is based on their own self-interest. They have failed to acknowledge or fully consider that lifting sanctions would empower Castro to cling to power and continue his reign of terror over millions of suffering people.

The members of the Americans for a Free Cuba have heroically made the case for those Cubans who cannot speak for themselves because of Castro's brutal and restrictive regime through their silent vigil and demonstration. This is a regime that prohibits freedom in almost every way possible while punishing and imprisoning all opposition. The compelling stories of Cuban defectors clearly demonstrate that many will do whatever they can to escape the dreadful conditions brought about by their totalitarian ruler. Both the people and political prisoners in Cuba as well as those who cherish freedom are counting on Americans to stand up to Castro and keep the pressure on through the embargo.

Thankfully, President Bush is behind The Americans for a Free Cuba 100 percent. I commend President Bush for the strong and unwavering stance he has taken against the Castro regime. The President has made it clear that the United States will work with Cuba only after Castro takes concrete measures to improve the abysmal human rights situation in his country. I support the President's demand to Castro that he must free political prisoners, legalize political activity, permit free elections, and cease discriminating against Cuban workers before Congress should even begin to consider lifting economic sanctions. Administration officials have vowed a Presidential veto to any version of the Treasury-Postal Appropriations bill that weakens trade or travel sanctions on Cuba.

The Cuba Political Prisoners Initiative was initially launched in April when over a dozen members of Congress, from both political parties, adopted a dozen political prisoners. These prisoners each have a unique story but all share in a common suffering because of their love of freedom.

While the Cuba Political Prisoners Initiative was launched this Spring, it will not end until every single Cuban political prisoner is free. I am sending out a letter signed by my colleagues who are part of this initiative to Sergio

Vielra de Mello, the new UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, urging him to follow through on the resolution this commission adopted in April that called on the Cuban government to improve its record on human, civil, and political rights and allow the UN and other representatives to examine human rights conditions in Cuba.

Twenty former political prisoners were amongst those gathered on the Senate steps today.

They are the heroes for freedom that endured the horrors of Castro's Cuba and lived to tell about it. Also in attendance was Maritza Lugo Fernandez a former Cuban political prisoner joining us today who was jailed more than 30 times before she was exiled by the Castro regime. Her husband, Rafael Ibarra Roque, is still a political prisoner in Cuba and is the prisoner I have adopted.

Before going to prison, where he has been since 1994, Mr. Roque's home was raided by Castro's thugs, who seized virtually everything he owned of value including the family car, the stove, a television, and even his pets. He was arrested and charged with "sabotage," but no credible evidence whatsoever exists that he committed this crime. Those close to the case know his real "crime" was having the courage and audacity to speak out against the regime and demand the same freedoms Americans—and other freedom loving people hold to be self-evident and a basic foundation for society.

Mr. Roque has been sentenced to twenty years in the wretched Combinado del Este Prison in Havana where political prisoners are subjected to especially brutal treatment. The State Department's 2001 Human Rights report on Cuba speaks of political prisoners suffering beatings, intimidation, and sexual abuse. These abuses are carried out not only by prison officials but also by state security agents posing as prisoners.

Unfortunately Mr. Roque's case is not an exception but rather the norm for human rights activists in Cuba. Hundreds of others whose only crime is their love of freedom languish in Castro's prisons and the Cuban people as a whole have suffered under the terror of his rule for over 40 years.

The Cuba Political Prisoners Initiative display that we have opened in the Senate Rotunda is somber but will serve as an important reminder of the hundreds of innocent Cubans languishing in Castro's prisons for all Senators, Senate staff, and visitors who pass by it each day. I am confident that when the American people and members of Congress hear the true facts about the great human rights abuses occurring in Cuba, and fully consider the great harm Castro seeks to do our nation through working with terrorist states and harboring fugitives of justice, they will agree that keeping sanctions on Cuba is our only option.

The challenge of fighting for human rights in Cuba remains great. However, we must never give up and we must never, ever forget those who are persecuted for carrying the torch of freedom.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF CONGRESS ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF TERRORIST ATTACKS LAUNCHED AGAINST THE UNITED STATES ON SEPTEMBER 11, 2001

SPEECH OF

HON. STEPHEN F. LYNCH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 2002

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize and pay tribute to the victims of the tragic events of one year ago. Last year on September 11th Americans awoke to a brutal attack on our country on its own soil. Throughout the course of this one tragic day, something that at once seemed inconceivable became a horrific reality. No one feels the pain of this day more acutely than the families and friends of the more than 3,000 people who lost their lives at the Pentagon, the World Trade Center and in Shanksville, Pennsylvania. All of these people and their families are in our thoughts and prayers on this somber occasion.

Although there is little that we in Congress can do to ease those families' suffering, by adopting this resolution, we are reaffirming our commitment to honor the memory of the people who were lost that day, while also paying tribute to those individuals who unselfishly risked their own lives to protect others.

Mr. Speaker, September 11th was one of the most difficult days in American history. But in the darkness of that day, an incredible spirit of bravery and hope emerged. Hundreds of emergency rescue personnel descended upon the scene at both the World Trade Center and the Pentagon with the sole purpose of assisting others. At the same time, ordinary people demonstrated amazing courage by trying to help others escape while putting themselves in peril and in fighting back against the terrorists on United Flight 93. It is truly remarkable how many people gave their lives trying to protect others. The bravery and generosity of these people is a lasting mark of September 11th.

In responding to these extraordinarily trying times, the true fabric of American society was illustrated to the world. Americans around the world came together and generously gave of themselves in a myriad of ways. Rescue workers spent countless hours at ground zero searching for survivors and then shuffling through the debris. Construction workers, ironworkers and other personnel tirelessly worked their way through the wreckage in an effort to cleanup the site. Their important task would not be interrupted by exhaustion, injury or inclement weather. However, far away from ground zero, and across the globe, people generously gave their time, energy, money and caring to help support the loved ones of the lost victims. Today, we honor these selfless contributions.

As we gather now, one year later, it is my hope that we never forget the spirit that pervaded this country in the weeks and months following the attacks. As we continue to rebuild and to heal, we will need to draw upon that strength. The American people demonstrated amazing resolve and resilience in the last year, and it is a resolve that we must continue to maintain, day by day, week by week, this year and for many years, that we will preserve our freedoms, protect our families, and work to cleanse the world of the scourge of terrorism.

Mr. Speaker, in the wake of September 11th, Congress rallied in a strong bipartisan manner to quickly pass legislative measures to protect our country. It was this remarkable unity of purpose that most struck me when I was sworn into this body in October of last year. Over time, this unity has dissipated some, but our goal should remain clear. We in Congress owe it to the American people to do all that we can to make sure that the necessary resources are available to protect our country. This is a serious responsibility and not one that should be burdened by partisan debate. In the coming months, we must act responsibly and decisively to ensure that the people of the United States once again feel safe in their own cities and towns. I commend the leadership of both the Republican and Democratic parties for recognizing this important anniversary and for introducing this thoughtful resolution.

PAYING TRIBUTE TO THE TOWN OF LA JARA

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to honor the town of La Jara, Colorado as a beacon of western spirit and pride for over a century. I am proud to have the pleasure of applauding a growing community that strengthens our society's values. The town is truly an inspirational token, established and sustained through determination and hard work and I am honored to pay tribute to the town today.

La Jara was incorporated on March 11, 1902 with Mayor Austin Valdez as the founding father and trailblazer for the town. La Jara settlers moved into the region to establish a better life and brought with them the vision and the tools to build a thriving community. La Jara's settlers first migrated West following the railroad and its expansionists prospects. The settlers lived in the region with no more than a few brick houses and a water tower and, although the lifestyle for each settler was hard and troublesome, the determination of those early pioneers laid the foundation that has upheld through the ages.

Initial settlement of the town is due in large to the San Luis Valley Company of the 1800s. In 1888, the company orchestrated a large sales campaign and sold numerous plots of land in La Jara. These plots motivated migrants to establish homes and settle the land in the valley, leading to a population boom by the 1890's. Today La Jara exists as an established town with all the essential functions and amenities of a metropolitan city.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my admiration and gratitude to the town and residents of La Jara, Colorado before this body of Congress and this nation. Truly the seeds of success have been planted in La Jara and are bringing forth the best for future generations.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that a longtime community leader in eastern Jackson County, MO, will be receiving the Citizen of the Year Award at the Truman Heartland Community Foundation annual benefit dinner. Mr. Kim Roam has demonstrated a strong commitment to the area and has helped to ensure a brighter future for the community.

Mr. Roam began his community activity in the county in 1983 after he joined the law firm Cochran, Oswald, McDonald Roam & Moore, P.C. COMMEMORATIVE JOINT MEETING
OF THE CONGRESS OF THE
UNITED STATES IN REMEM-BERANCE OF THE VICTIMS AND
HEROES OF SEPTEMBER 11, 2001,
AND IN RECOGNITION OF THE
COURAGE AND SPIRIT OF THE
CITY OF NEW YORK, FEDERAL
HALL, NEW YORK, NY, FRIDAY,
SEPTEMBER 6, 2002

SPEECH OF

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 2002

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in the House and Senate in commemorating the victims and heroes of September 11, 2001, during our special session of Congress held in Federal Hall in New York, New York.

On the days following the attacks on September 11th, Americans across the country came together to demonstrate the strength and resiliency of this great country. It is in that same spirit that we stand together today—both Republicans and Democrats—to reaffirm that strength and resiliency by showing a strong bipartisan expression that we are first and foremost Americans and are committed to protecting the freedoms and values that make this country great.

As we go through this week and revisit some of the darkest moments in our nation's history, we must remember that our nation has always been one that has triumphed over adversity. At times of great despair, America has consistently risen to its greatest hours.

In remembrance of those lives lost on September 11th and to heroes that emerged on that fateful day, I would like to close with some words from President Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address:

"that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion . . . that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain . . . that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom . . . and that government of the people . . . by the people . . . for the people . . . shall not perish from the earth."

May God bless America.

TRIBUTE TO MS. DOROTHY "DOT" B. THOMAS

HON. SAXBY CHAMBLISS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. CHAMBLISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Ms. Dorothy "Dot" B. Thomas a Community Developer for Central Savannah River Area Economic Opportunity Authority (EOA) in Augusta, Georgia. Ms. Thomas is the recipient of Experience Works' 2002 Older Worker of the Year award for my home state of Georgia.

Dot Thomas began her career at the EOA in 1971. Beginning first as a Community Developer, she studied and worked her way up to the Coordinator of the Energy Assistance Program. In 1996 she retired, but soon found herself back at EOA volunteering, mentoring new staff, and offering friendly advice based on her many years of experience. She was so valuable to the EOA that when a part-time position became available in 2000, Dot was convinced to come back to work saying . . . "I so enjoy working, learning new things, and interacting with others that I sometimes wonder why I retired."

In her current position as Community Developer, Dot works with families in need—assisting them with energy assistance, food, rent, clothing, etc. She says her most important contribution at EOA is giving people hope. "I want them to feel better about themselves when they leave my office. Many times people come in looking so bad. But when I can say something to make them feel better about themselves and their circumstances, it just makes my day special!" Lola Johnson, director of the EOA, contributes Ms. Thomas' professional success to the heart and soul she puts into her work. "Of all the accomplishments Dot has made over her years of service to our agency and the Central Savannah River Area community, probably the most important and long-lasting ones involve the impact she has had on the clients we serve as well as on her co-workers."

Dot's dedication to improving the quality of people's lives doesn't end with her job. She loves and lends support to her husband of 50+ years, Ernest, and to the rest of her family; she makes a "joyful noise" in her church choir; and she volunteers at the local soup kitchen. She has also been an active member of the Georgia Community Action Association for more than 30 years. Ms. Johnson sums it up best, being a human services worker is not what Dot does for a living, "it's who Dot Thomas is."

Mr. Speaker, please join me and all Georgians in congratulating Dot Thomas.

PAYING TRIBUTE TO ST. ANTHONY HOSPITALS' FLIGHT FOR LIFE

HON. SCOTT MCINNIS

OF COLORADO

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. MCINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding organization that continuously renders emergency medical aid at a moments notice. The St. Anthony Hospitals' Flight for Life program based in Denver, Colorado has saved thousands of lives since its inception. It is with great pleasure I stand and honor these courageous men and women who are so willingly dedicate their lives to help those in crisis.

Founded in 1972, Flight for Life was the first civilian emergency air ambulance in the nation. Some 200 air ambulance programs all over the world have since patterned their emergency response units after Flight for Life's excellence. This commendable program serves the people of Colorado and eight surrounding states, and its members have registered over 65,000 missions in the first 30 years of service. Over its history, Flight for Life's crews responded to the 1976 gondola accident in Vail, Colorado; the 1985 Keystone Teller Lift collapse; and the Columbine High School shootings in 2000, among the thousands of missions flown. Medical missions have taken them to 40 states as well as Canada, Mexico, and Costa Rica.

In order to meet each challenge, Flight for Life maintains an elite core of medical professionals and pilots; each one with specialized experience and that allows them to react professionally to any life-threatening experience in a variety of environments. To help in that mission, the program also maintains a mountain base outside the Denver Metro area, the highest medical helicopter base in the country, at the Summit Medical Center in Frisco, Colorado. From there, they operate a specialized avalanche rescue team and often help transport search teams to the scene. With so many professions ready to respond to any emergency situation, Flight for Life continues to stand out as a leader in emergency response excellence.

Mr. Speaker, I stand today to pay tribute to the men and women of this organization before this body of Congress and this nation. The Flight for Life program has raised the bar for emergency response throughout the world.

These courageous professionals have served the people of this nation with distinction for 30 years and deserve our praise.

IN MEMORY OF SEPTEMBER 11
AND ITS FORGOTTEN VICTIMS

HON. DAN BURTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we are commemorating the terrible attack on America this past September 11. This was a terrible event in which about 3,000 people lost their lives. A year later, they are in our prayers.

Also in our prayers are the other victims—those who were subjected to violent, unfair attacks in the aftermath of September 11. One of these was Balbir Singh Sodhi, a gasoline station owner from Arizona. He was murdered at his gas station by someone who apparently mistook him for a follower of Osama bin Laden. His brother, Sukhpal Singh Sodhi, a cab driver in the San Francisco Bay area, was recently killed in his taxicab. I am sure that we would all like to extend our sympathies to the Sodhi family.

No one should be killed because of his religion. Even if Mr. Sodhi had been a Muslim and a follower of bin Laden that would not justify murdering him. But what makes this crime even more disturbing is that this perception was a mistake. Mr. Sodhi was a Sikh, not Muslim.

Sikhism is an independent, monotheistic, revealed religion that believes in the equality of all people, including gender equality. It is not part of either Hinduism or Islam, yet because of the turbans they wear, which are required by their religion, Sikhs are sometimes mistaken for Muslim followers of bin Laden.

The violence has mostly ended, but there are still some unrelated violent incidents. Unfortunately, Balbir Singh Sodhi's brother was also killed just a couple of months ago in his taxicab outside San Francisco. I call for an end to all these attacks and for full and prompt prosecution of all the people responsible.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to place the Council of Khalistan's recent press release on the anniversary of September 11 into the RECORD at this time.

IN MEMORY OF THOSE KILLED IN LAST YEAR'S ATTACK ON UNITED STATES

Sikhs Suffered the Most After the Attacks

Council of Khalistan Condemns Attacks,
Calls for End to Violence Against Minorities

WASHINGTON, D.C., September 11, 2002.—Dr. Gurmit Singh Aulakh, President of the Council of Khalistan, today remembered the attacks on America a year ago that killed almost 3,000 Americans. He also condemned the violence against Sikh Americans and other minorities that broke out in the wake of the September 11 attacks.

"On behalf of the 21-million strong Sikh Nation and especially on behalf of more than 500,000 Sikh Americans, we remember with sadness and outrage the attacks on America a year ago and offer our prayers and sympathies on this sad anniversary to the people of the United States for the terrible attack on the United States and for the loss of life it entails," Dr. Aulakh said. "We especially pray for the families of those who have departed."

"America must do what it can to eradicate terrorism from the world," Dr. Aulakh said. "We support all the efforts to do so and we must do our part as American citizens," he said. "This sad anniversary reminds us that we stand together as a nation. We must show unity on this occasion."

"We also condemn the violence against Sikhs and other minorities that took place last year after the September 11 attacks," Dr. Aulakh said. "Sikhs suffered the most in the post-September 11 violence," he said. "The very first victim of this violence was Balbir Singh Sodhi, a Sikh gasoline station owner from the Phoenix area," he noted. Recently, his brother was killed in his taxicab. All this violence must stop," Dr. Aulakh said.

"Nobody should be killed for his or her religion, whether Sikh, Muslim, Christian, Jewish, Hindu, or whatever religion one may follow," Dr. Aulakh said. "But it is important to note that Sikhs are not Muslims nor followers of bin Laden. We condemn bin Laden," he said. "Unfortunately, because of the turbans we are required to wear, many people mistake Sikhs for bin Laden followers," he said. "The Sikh religion is an independent, monotheistic, sovereign religion that believes in the equality of the whole human race, including gender equality," he said. "Daily we pray for the well being of the whole human race."

In the wake of the September 11 attacks, a couple of young Sikhs were attacked in Brooklyn. Sikh businesses have been stoned and cars have been burned. A Sikh boy was even shot in New York. Many Muslims and other minorities were also subjected to violent attacks.

"We hope that there will not be any more of these incidents in connection with the anniversary of the attacks. "Violence against innocent people of any religion or ethnicity is unacceptable," said Dr. Aulakh. "It must be condemned and the violence must be ended."

TRIBUTE TO MR. SAMUEL J.
TENENBAUM

HON. JAMES E. CLYBURN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. CLYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a longtime friend, Mr. Samuel J. Tenenbaum of Lexington, SC. On Wednesday, September 18, 2002, Mr. Tenenbaum will receive the Lifetime Achievement award in the area of philanthropy from the Columbia Urban League Guild.

The Columbia Urban League is a non-profit organization that works for equal opportunity for everyone. The Columbia Urban League Guild is an affiliate and volunteer arm of the Columbia Urban League. The Lifetime Achievement Award is an award given to an individual who has made significant contributions to Columbia, the Midlands region, and the state.

A 1961 graduate of Savannah Country Day School, Mr. Tenenbaum graduated from Emory University with a Bachelor's of Arts degree in History. He went on to do graduate studies in American Studies at the University of Minnesota. In 1967, he went to work in his family business, Chatham Steel Corporation, from which he retired in 2000 as Vice-President.

An outstanding citizen of the State of South Carolina, Mr. Tenenbaum presently serves as chairman of the Alston Wilkes Foundation, trustee of both the Columbia Jewish Foundation and the Columbia Museum of Art, and chairman of the Alumni Advisory Committee to the Institute of Jewish Studies at Emory University. He is also a member of Habitat for Humanity, First Union Bank Advisory Board, The Richard W. Riley Institute of Furman University, and The Kosmos Club.

I have had the pleasure of knowing Sam for longer than either of us care to remember. He has been a driving force behind the scenes in almost every major community initiative affecting the Columbia Metropolitan area. He puts his heart and soul into each and every endeavor whether it is raising money to replace a New York City fire truck lost on September 11th or building bridges between different racial and ethnic groups. Sam Tenenbaum is one of the most dedicated public servants I have ever known who prefers to stay out of the limelight and let his generous spirit speak for itself.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that you and my colleagues join me in commending Mr. Samuel Tenenbaum on his Lifetime Achievement recognition by the Columbia Urban League Guild. I cannot think of anyone more deserving of this honor.

FOSELLA-WATT MOTION TO INSTRUCT

HON. CAROLYN B. MALONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mrs. MALONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, as we continue our war on terrorism, we must remain vigilant in our efforts to decimate the terrorists that are threatening our very existence and have singled out Americans who represent freedom and democracy, so cherished by our citizens.

I strongly support the Fossella-Watt motion to instruct which will finally allow American victims of international terrorism to receive compensation from blocked assets—judgments they were already awarded.

Last week, we commemorated the anniversary of 9/11. A day that marked the most devastating acts ever committed on U.S. soil.

There may not be another Member of Congress who lost more constituents in the September 11th attacks on the World Trade Center than I did.

I knew countless number of victims and their families and one year later, the pain and hardship go on. No amount of money can bring back our loved ones, but this motion to instruct can work to prevent future tragic acts of terrorism.

It paralyzes the financial resources of those terrorist organizations and increases our ability to go after the sources of funding for these organizations and cells. It sends a message to terrorists that we will not stand for the murder of innocent Americans. And, those who target Americans will be punished.

The United States must use every tool in its arsenal—military, diplomatic, and legal—to protect Americans and other innocent parties against these random acts of terror.

The Fossella-Watt motion to instruct is a tool to weaken the terrorist grip.

I urge my colleagues to retain this provision in the final version of the Terrorism Insurance bill.

TRIBUTE TO DEPUTY UNDER SECRETARY ROGER R. RAPP

---

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY
Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I rise today to pay tribute to Mr. Roger R. Rapp, who on October 3, 2002, will be retiring after serving 30 years at the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Roger personifies the steadfast career civil servant. He began his federal career at the Veterans Health Administration in 1972, advancing through various positions which included field assignments at VA medical centers in Dayton, Ohio, and Washington, DC. Ultimately, Roger moved to the National Cemetery Administration (NCA), where he served as the director of the National Cemetery Area Office in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. In 1987, Roger was named Director of Field Operations for the NCA. In March of 2000, his title was changed to that which it is today, Deputy Under Secretary for Operations. As the one responsible for operations and construction at NCA, Roger has personally visited each of the 120 VA National Cemeteries.

Roger's dedication to veterans and their families is apparent to all who know him, and he truly is a man with a vision. He has been a leading voice in ensuring the expansion of existing cemeteries, development of new national cemeteries, and expanding the State Cemetery Grants Program. Through his leadership, the number of national cemeteries increased from 103 in 1973 when NCA was formed, to the current 120; five new national cemeteries are currently in the planning stages.

It is said that Roger knows the majority of NCA employees nationwide on a first name basis, and he has devoted his career to helping all VA employees take pride in their jobs and focus on the needs of veterans. Owing to his leadership, NCA scored 93 percent on the American Customer Satisfaction Index, the highest score of any federal government entity. Roger was also instrumental in establishing the Director Training Programs to provide upward mobility and career advancement for VA employees throughout the system. Additionally, he's contributed significantly over the years to Leadership VA, the agency's executive development program.

Mr. Speaker, Roger Rapp is an advocate for veterans and has dedicated 30 years to this advocacy—20 years with the National Cemetery Administration alone. And when the situation called for it, he has done so with humor and selflessness. Indeed, Roger was a lucid and forthright witness when testifying before the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Thank you, Roger, for your dedication to America's veterans. You are leaving, a lasting legacy of dedicated federal service.

Mr. BRADY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate Mr. Michael Richmond, President and CEO of The Woodlands Operating Company, as he prepares to retire from 30 years of dedication and service to The Woodlands Community.

Michael Richmond is a visionary. He shared in the original vision for The Woodlands almost from the very inception when he joined George Mitchell and his team in 1972.

During these past 30 years, Michael's career moved rapidly within The Woodlands Corporation and then into The Woodlands Operating Company. He became treasurer, then senior financial officer and moved into the operations area as senior vice president of commercial development. In 1985 he was named executive vice president of the company with responsibilities encompassing commercial, The Woodlands Conference Center and Resort, investment properties, apartments, office buildings, industrial development and retail shopping centers. He was named President and CEO on November 1, 1998. Currently, Michael is serving on numerous boards and is affiliated with many community services. When he heard Michael was retiring, George Mitchell stated "I hate to see it, Mike is a very knowledgeable person. He did a great job of keeping the vision alive."

Mr. Speaker, please join me and the citizens of The Woodlands, Texas, in thanking and congratulating Michael Richmond on a job well done.

COMMEMORATIVE JOINT MEETING
OF THE CONGRESS OF THE
UNITED STATES IN REMEM-BRANCE OF THE VICTIMS AND
HEROES OF SEPTEMBER 11 2001,
AND IN RECOGNITION OF THE
COURAGE AND SPIRIT OF THE
CITY OF NEW YORK, FEDERAL
HALL, NEW YORK, NY, FRIDAY,
SEPTEMBER 6, 2002

SPEECH OF

HON. BOB ETHERIDGE

OF NEW YORK
Friday, September 6, 2002

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Mr. Speaker, it's hard to believe that it's been almost a full year since that awful day. On September 11, 2001, all the world saw the very face of evil. And on that day and every day since, we have felt the heartbeat of America.

For me, the most enduring image of 9/11 was the sight of the Pentagon on fire after the terrorists crashed American Airlines Flight 77 into our nation's military headquarters. A thick black smoky cloud oozed from the Pentagon and hung over the banks of the Potomac River. I will never forget seeing with my own eyes that proud building engulfed in flames. Then the whole world watched TV in stunned disbelief as the twin towers of the World Trade Center came crumbling down in a fiery wreck of twisted steel.

On that day, America was changed forever. But, the test in life is not whether or not you ever get knocked down. The true test is whether you have the courage, pride and determination to get back up again. Every day since September 11, the people of this country have gotten back up.

We Americans from all walks of life have pulled together like never before. We have stood united to tell our enemies that the spirit of America will never be broken. We will not rest until we have eliminated Osama bin Laden and his terrorist network.

In the year since 9/11, we have come to treasure the service and sacrifice of ordinary Americans and extraordinarily heroic. The selfless devotion of the firefighters, police, EMS and other public servants in New York City and the Pentagon have given us new appreciation for our hometown heroes whose everyday service does so much to strengthen our communities. The dedicated professionalism of our men and women in uniform renew our pride in our country and make us thankful for our many, many blessings. And the incredible story of the passengers of the hijacked plane who fought back and prevented the tragic events of that day from being even worse inspires us all to take charge and give back to our country.

September 11 taught us anew the immeasurable strength of the uniquely American ideal of "We, the people." As we memorialize the lives lost one year ago, let us also celebrate the renewed spirit of America that has been reinvigorated by the service and sacrifice of so many ordinary citizens and inspirational heroes.

RECOGNIZING OUTSTANDING SERVICE TO OUR NATION

HON. MIKE ROSS

OF ARKANSAS

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor and congratulate an outstanding member of our military, and native of my district, whose impressive service in the United States Navy makes our district, our country, and me very proud.

Vince McBeth was born the fourth child of Velma McBeth-Slaughter and the late Manuel M. McBeth in Camden, Arkansas. In 1983, he graduated from Fairview High School, where his impressive athletic and academic performance earned him many honors. He went on to earn a Bachelor of Science Degree in Political Science at the U.S. Naval Academy, where he was Captain of the Navy Football Team as well as an officer on the Brigade Staff.

Upon receiving a commission as an Ensign in the U.S. Navy, McBeth completed division officer tours aboard two guided-missile frigates, USS Duncan and USS John A. Moore, and a guided-missile cruiser, USS Antietam, in Long Beach, California. He then served as Operations Officer aboard the USS Barry in Norfolk, Virginia.

At age 30, McBeth became one of the youngest officers to command a warship. As Commanding Officer of the USS Tempest, McBeth commanded more than 50 special warfare missions while deployed to the European and Caribbean theaters. After earning a Master's Degree in International Relations from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University, McBeth returned to serve as Executive Officer of the USS Barry. He now serves as a Commander in the U.S. Navy and the Administrative Aide to the Secretary of the Navy. McBeth was recently appointed as a White House Fellow.

McBeth's service to our country extends beyond his actions in the military. He has coordinated Adopt-A-School programs in several communities and implemented U.S. Embassy-sponsored community relations projects in numerous countries abroad. His awards include the Legion of Merit, Meritorious Service Medal, two Navy Commendation Medals, and three Navy Achievement Medals.

Throughout his life, McBeth has sought to better himself, his community, and his country. He is a model for today's youth of what is possible through hard work, discipline, and most of all, compassion. I congratulate him on his recent White House appointment, and I wish him luck in what I know will be many more selfless years of service to our great nation.

PAYING TRIBUTE TO ADAM CURRY

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct privilege to recognize Adam Curry of Clifton, Colorado for the recent contribution he has made to the advancement of science. An undergraduate student at Mesa State College and only 18 years old, Adam has invented an earthquake warning system that has received much attention from numerous people throughout the scientific community.

Adam Curry has shown lots of interest and enthusiasm for electronics throughout his life. As a kid, Adam spent afternoons taking apart various appliances around the house to try to understand how they operated. Today, the curiosity of Adam's childhood has developed into an extraordinary talent for electrical engineering. Adam has just recently developed an electronic device that measures minute amounts of electron activity related to earthquakes and uses gravity to create a computer language. The language can then be transmitted through the Internet to warn that an earthquake is coming. The invention is significant because it provides scientists around the world with the ability to measure earthquake activity.

Over the summer, Adam traveled extensively throughout the country and Eastern Europe to enlighten the scientific community to the utility of his new earthquake warning system. He hopes to have his new invention placed in 20 different locations throughout the world. He has met with many scientists from prestigious universities such as the University of Virginia, Harvard University, and the University of St. Petersburg, and from all accounts, everyone is very excited about the possibilities that his earthquake warning system has to offer. Currently, Adam is in the process of modifying his invention into a smaller, more convenient prototype that can be installed directly into a user's computer.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to recognize Mr. Adam Curry before this body of Congress and this nation for his outstanding accomplishment in the fields of science and electronics. It is very satisfying and encouraging to see our upcoming generation of young people committed to the prosperity of knowledge and to the progress of academic achievement. Adam Curry has only begun to reveal the true merits of his potential, and we shall witness many more accomplishments and contributions from him in the years to come. Congratulations on your achievement, Adam, and keep up the good work.

14TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE UPRISING OF THE BURMESE PEOPLE

HON. DANA ROHRABACHER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Mr. Speaker, today is the 14th anniversary of the uprising of the Burmese people against the drug dealing military dictatorship that rules their nation. On this solemn occasion we need to ask ourselves what we can do to help those brave people help themselves.

The people of Burma and their elected leaders, Aung San Suu Kyi and members of the National League for Democracy (the NLD), have struggled for over a decade to bring an end to the military dictatorship. In 1991 Daw Aung San Suu Kyi won the Nobel Peace Prize for defying great odds in standing firm against this heinous regime. She has spent years under house arrest and hundreds of members of her political party, the National League for Democracy, have disappeared into Burma's notorious prison system.

Fourteen years ago the Army slaughtered thousands in cold blood on the streets of Rangoon and imprisoned and tortured thousands more.

The people of Burma believe that the people and the government of our great Nation stand strongly behind them. Today some governments in the world are struggling to decide whether or not to support the war against terrorism while they sponsor acts of domestic terrorism against their own citizens. We need to ensure that we keep the friends that we have by not making any deals with such governments as the Burmese junta or Chinese communists. By supporting the people of Burma over the totalitarian regime that is currently in power, we will not only help the people of Burma to help free themselves but we will be creating the good will in the future that will enable us to fight terrorism in that area of the world.

Lately though, I have seen some news about Burma that greatly disturbs me. The military dictators have come knocking on the door of the United States asking for money for what they call humanitarian aid, while simultaneously spending $130 million on MIG fighter planes from the Russians. This is nonsensical. We should not waste American taxpayer money on aid money that encourages the regime to spend more on weapons. We should also not forget who has caused the humanitarian crisis in Burma and why. The regime is entirely responsible for the sufferings of the Burmese people; their lack of good governance—any form of governance—has resulted in a debacle of the public health sector.

Even more disturbing than this, however, I have recently seen evidence that the military regime has sent its scientists to Russia to learn to build a nuclear reactor. The United States must do everything in its power to ensure this does not happen. The Burmese regime has proven repeatedly not only its callous brutality, but complete disregard for international opinion. Nuclear power in the hands of the Burmese dictators that terrorize their own people makes Southeast Asia and the world a more dangerous place.

The United States and the international community ought to inform the Burmese junta that in no uncertain terms it should immediately begin full-scale political talks with the elected leaders of Burma, the National League for Democracy, and ethnic nationalities aimed at speedy transition to democracy. I have met many of the leaders of Burma's struggle for freedom myself and I can tell you they would be outstanding partners for the United States and the world. In the meantime, to ignore the threat posed by an armed, nuclear Burmese military regime would be a serious error.

HONORING THE CAREER OF REDONDO COUNCILMAN KEVIN SULLIVAN

HON. JANE HARMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Ms. HARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the distinguished career of a constituent and friend—Redondo Beach City Councilman Kevin Sullivan, who resigned from the city council earlier this year.

As a dedicated council member, Kevin served the city of Redondo Beach for more than five years. He was a representative from the Second District of the city, which includes not only my district office but also both a power plant and a beautiful harbor. Kevin knew how to balance the needs of these two potentially competing interests.

In general, Kevin's career was focused on the best interests of the community, from his seat on a local committee against LAX expansion to holding local town meetings for the public. He was a person who could be counted on to take care of the community's needs while making the time to return his constituents' phone calls.

Kevin has always been there for the community. As a union leader for many years, he was thought of as a great negotiator. His skills served the people in his union while gaining him respect from others who watched him fight for causes he thought worthy. He never ducked the tough fights.

I loved Kevin's Boston accent—which fit in particularly well at the Redondo Lobster Festival. He knows everyone, and I have been fortunate over many years to have his strong support and help.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that Kevin has decided to leave public service, but I expect he will return one day. Meanwhile, I am certain I will miss his smile, pleasant humor and good deeds. He has added a great deal. Well done, my friend!

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

OPPOSING THE WAR ON CIVIL LIBERTIES

HON. JANICE D. SCHAKOWSKY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Ms. SCHAKOWSKY. Mr. Speaker, I remain strongly opposed to the continued efforts by President Bush, Attorney General Ashcroft and the Administration to seriously endanger our country's civil liberties. In the aftermath of the September 11 tragedies, Congress moved quickly to enact sweeping legislation granting additional powers to federal, state and local law enforcement authorities in the name of fighting terrorism. I voted against that measure because I believed, and still believe, that such measures intrude significantly on the important civil liberties that make American democracy invaluable and unique.

The "anti-terrorism" legislation contained numerous provisions that had little or nothing to do with the war on terrorist activities. Amongst other things, the law authorized covert searches for any Federal criminal investigation, including the IRS, without restricting those to terrorist activities; provided for unprecedented wiretapping authority; gave access to confidential financial and medical information granted by a secret court; and allowed indefinite detention of immigrants solely on the basis of suspicion.

In a September 10, 2002 editorial, the New York Times outlines the continuing and substantial nature of the assault on our civil liberties. In the wake of September 11, the administration has shown its "contempt for basic rights in its enthusiasm for military tribunals."

Today, one year after the events that so tragically shook the nation, our precious civil liberties continue to be endangered in the name of "anti-terrorism efforts." Such a secret, covert and, ultimately un-American agenda serves only to increase paranoia, rouse unnecessary public fear and stifle the protections that are fundamental to freedom, democracy and an open society. Rather than increasing security, such actions serve only to asphyxiate the public trust. Rather than protecting against terrorism, the foundations and principles upon which American democracy exist are slowly being eroded. The 4th Amendment was created for the purpose of ensuring our rights and protecting against the very violations to which our government would now subject us. The war on terror can be fought without surrendering our rights. As so amply stated in the New York Times, "Fear is no guide to the Constitution. We must fight the enemies abroad without yielding to those at home."

I urge my colleagues to read the September 10, 2002 New York Times editorial entitled, "The War on Civil Liberties."

[From the New York Times, Sept. 10, 2002]

THE WAR ON CIVIL LIBERTIES

It would be easy to dismiss the harm that has been done to our civil liberties in the past year. Most of us do not know anyone whose rights have been seriously curtailed. The 1,200 detainees rounded up after Sept. 11 and held in secret were mainly Muslim men with immigration problems. So were the people the government tried to deport in closed hearings. The two Americans who were labeled "enemy combatants," hustled off to military brigs and denied the right even to meet with a lawyer, are a Saudi American man captured in Afghanistan and a onetime Chicago gang member.

September 17, 2002

There is also no denying that the need for effective law enforcement is greater than ever. The Constitution, Justice Arthur Goldberg once noted, is not a suicide pact.

And yet to curtail individual rights, as the Bush administration has done, is to draw exactly the wrong lessons from history. Every time the country has felt threatened and tightened the screws on civil liberties, it later wished it had not done so. In each case—whether the barring of government criticism under the Sedition Act of 1798 and the Espionage Act of 1918, the internment of Japanese-Americans in World War II or the McCarthyite witch hunts of the cold war—profound regrets set in later.

When we are afraid, as we have all been this year, civil liberties can seem abstract. But they are at the core of what separates this country from nearly all others; they are what we are defending when we go to war. To slash away at liberty in order to defend it is not only illogical, it has proved to be a failure. Yet that is what has been happening.

Since last September, the Bush administration has held people in prison indefinitely and refused to tell the public who is being held or even how many detainees there are. No less odious than the administration's secret arrests are its secret trials. The government has barred the public and the press from deportation hearings for immigrants suspected of ties to terrorism.

The administration has also shown contempt for basic rights in its enthusiasm for military tribunals. In November, when President Bush first issued the order setting these up, it seemed the administration wanted to try anyone alleged to have ties to terrorism, even American citizens arrested in the United States, in military courts. Faced with an uproar, the administration backed down, announcing that the tribunals would accord defendants some rights. It then decided to try several prominent terrorism suspects in civilian courts.

This summer the administration unveiled, with great fanfare, the TIPS program (for Terrorism Information and Prevention System), to recruit Americans to spy on their fellow Americans. As originally conceived, TIPS was to include mail carriers, utility workers and others with access to people's homes. Again, after a popular outcry the administration scaled TIPS back.

In times of conflict, the president seeks to increase his power. Congress, sensitive to public fears over safety, cannot always be counted on to stand up to him. That leaves the Judiciary and members of the public to worry about the trampling of rights. This year a number of judges have stood out for their courage. Gladys Kessler, of Federal District Court in Washington, D.C., declared that secret arrests were "odious to a democratic society," and ordered the government to release the names of all detainees. It has not done so. And Judge Robert Doumar of Federal District Court in Norfolk, Va., who is presiding over one of the "enemy combatant" cases, recently told prosecutors to submit documents for his review so he could determine if the defendant was in fact an enemy combatant. The Justice Department, disgracefully, defied his order.

As the Bush administration continues down its path, the American people need to make clear that they have learned from history and will not allow their rights to be rolled back. The world has changed since Sept. 11, but the values this country was founded on have not. Fear is no guide to the Constitution. We must fight the enemies of freedom abroad without yielding to those at home.

FIRE ISLAND AND THE WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

HON. STEVE ISRAEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 17, 2002

Mr. ISRAEL. Mr. Speaker, as the House begins the process of reauthorizing the Water Resources Development Act, I wanted to inform my colleagues of correspondence between myself, the gentleman from New York, Mr. GRUCCI, and the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works, Les Brownlee.

Mr. GRUCCI and I wrote to the Assistant Secretary in June to note the fact that, in our opinion, the Army Corps of Engineers has not suitably complied with Section 342 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1999. I ask that our letter of June 19, 2002 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

Today my office received a reply from the Assistant Secretary, which I now ask be printed in the RECORD. In his reply, the Assistant Secretary noted that the Army Corps "deferred all investigations on the Fire Island Interim project in July 2001" due to the State's desire to focus on the Fire Island Reformulation project, which is slated to end in November 2005.

I bring these letters to the attention of my colleagues to help them in their deliberations on the Water Resources Development Act.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, June 19, 2002.

Hon. CRAIG MANSON,
Assistant Secretary for Fish & Wildlife and Parks, U.S. Department of the Interior, Washington, DC.

Hon. LES BROWNLEE,
Under Secretary of the Army and Acting Assistant Secretary for Civil Works, U.S. Department of the Army, Washington, DC.

DEAR ASSISTANT SECRETARY MANSON AND UNDER SECRETARY BROWNLEE: In 1999, the Congress passed, and the President signed, the Water Resources Development Act of 1999. Within that legislation was a Section of particular concern to us as Representatives of the South Shore of Suffolk County, New York. Section 342 of that law concerns the Fire Island Interim Project (FIIP), a routine beach nourishment project made necessary by the severe northeast storms of 1991-96. Those storms gravely weakened the barrier island, which protects the communities of the South Shore.

In an effort to resolve differences between the Army Corps of Engineers, the Fish & Wildlife Service and the National Park Service, the statute required your agencies to "complete all procedures and reviews expeditiously and to adopt and submit to Congress, not later than 120 days after the date of enactment . . . a mutually acceptable shore erosion plan for the Fire Island to Moriches Inlet reach of the project." Almost three years have passed, but Congress has yet to receive such a plan. This continued inaction raises serious concerns as to why your agencies could not agree on a plan that would allow this beach preservation effort to go forward.

As you may know, the FIIP is an interim segment of a storm damage reduction and hurricane protection plan authorized by Congress more than 40 years ago. It arose in response to a request by New York State for Corps recommendations in the wake of the storms of the early 1990s. The Corps recommended, and then Governor Cuomo's Coastal Erosion Task Force endorsed, a project that would serve as a bridge to a final "reformulated" plan for protecting Long Island's South Shore. Unfortunately, this important project has been constantly delayed.

This project is fully justified economically on the basis of reduction of storm damage to properties, both on the barrier island and in low-lying areas of the mainland. It is also of vital importance to the region's tourist economy and to the continued health of wildlife habitat, including that of certain endangered species, on the barrier. We are also concerned by the fact that despite a clear legal mandate, your agencies have not given Congress a "mutually acceptable shore erosion plan for the Fire Island to Moriches Inlet reach of the project."

Thank you for your attention to this matter. We look forward to hearing a response from your agencies as soon as possible and we hope to work with you in the future to resolve this issue.

Sincerely,

FELIX J. GRUCCI, JR.,
STEVE ISRAEL,

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
CIVIL WORKS

Washington DC, September 17, 2002.

Hon. STEVEN J. ISRAEL,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ISRAEL: Thank you for your letter of June 19, 2002, co-signed by Congressman Felix J. Grucci, Jr. concerning the Fire Island Interim project and the Congressional directive contained in Section 342 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1999.

In accordance with the 1999 Partnership Agreement between the Departments of Army and Interior, the New York District prepared a draft decision document for the Fire Island Interim project. This project was a short-term project to reduce the potential for storm damages along the south shore of Long Island until completion and implementation of a more comprehensive plan, which could result from the ongoing reformulation study for Fire Island Inlet to Montauk Point. In a letter dated December 17, 1999, Dr. Joseph Westphal wrote to the Speaker of the House concerning our progress, specifically noting the draft decision document and draft Environmental Impact Statement, and our hope that a mutually acceptable solution would emerge as a result of the public and agency review.

During 2000, the New York District received many comments on the proposed Fire Island Interim project. The Department of Interior and the State of New York shared many concerns. Based on these concerns, the time that had passed to reach agreement on an interim project, and the time remaining to complete the reformulation study, the state decided not to support the proposed interim project. Instead, the State wished to focus on completing the reformulation study. Therefore, the Army Corps of Engineers (Corps) deferred all investigations on the Fire Island Interim project in July 2001.

The Corps has currently scheduled completion of the reformulation study in November 2005. All of the cooperating agencies are working towards developing a comprehensive plan, which would address various concerns noted during the evaluation of the interim project. Upon completion and analysis of the reformulation study, there may be an opportunity to construct initial, or separable increments of the overall project. If the particular concern at that time is construction along the Fire Island barrier island, then we will put our efforts towards achieving that goal.

Thank you for your interest in the Civil Works program. I hope that this letter addresses your concerns. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you need any additional information.

Sincerely,

L. BROWNLEE,
Acting Assistant Secretary of the Army (Civil Works).

COMMEMORATIVE JOINT MEETING
OF THE CONGRESS OF THE
UNITED STATES IN REMEM-BRANCE OF THE VICTIMS AND
HEROES OF SEPTEMBER 11, 2001,
AND IN RECOGNITION OF THE
COURAGE AND SPIRIT OF THE
CITY OF NEW YORK, FEDERAL
HALL, NEW YORK, NY, FRIDAY,
SEPTEMBER 6, 2002

SPEECH OF

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Friday, September 6, 2002

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, and my fellow colleagues of the United States Congress, we are here in the City of New York as representatives of a United States that is bound together as never before. It is a tragic bond, as it came at a cost of immeasurable suffering to the people of this great city, and to those who lost their loved ones in the Pentagon or on flight 93 that ended in Shanksville, PA. Today we are gathered in remembrance of the events that pierced our hearts one year ago.

On September 11th, the terrible and violent acts perpetrated against our homeland took the lives of so many innocents. In the days after the attacks, the courage and strength of our rescue workers lifted the spirits of our nation. In the weeks and months following, an outpouring of generosity from every corner of our nation showed that we stand together. Thousands lined up to give blood in a gesture that Americans would share the essence of life with no regard for whom the recipient might be. The continuing work of the young men and women in our armed forces is a declaration that those responsible for such cowardly acts will not escape justice. Today, one year later, we can say that our wound are healing. Our nation has overcome a great deal, and it is unity that has helped us overcome our grief.

We, as public servants, have come together to realize an even greater responsibility to our nation. These memories are a reminder that we must remain vigilant while we rebuild and that we must never allow our greatest treasure, our liberty, to be vulnerable to the will of our enemies.

We will never forget the innocent victims. We will never forget the heroes. It is with their memory in our hearts that we live each day with a greater sense of purpose and a deeper appreciation for the gifts that we in this nation share.

EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF CONGRESS ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF TERRORIST ATTACKS LAUNCHED AGAINST THE UNITED STATES ON SEPTEMBER 11, 2001

SPEECH OF

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 2002

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, we are commemorating the terrible attack on America on September 11 last year. This was a terrible event in which about 3,000 people lost their lives. A year later, they are in our prayers.

Also in our prayers are the other victims—those who were subjected to violent, unfair attacks in the aftermath of September 11. One of these was Balbir Singh Sodhi, a gasoline station owner from Arizona. He was murdered at his gas station by someone who apparently mistook him for a follower of Osama bin Laden. His brother, Sukhpal Singh Sodhi, a cab driver in the San Francisco Bay area, was recently killed in his taxicab. I am sure that we would all like to extend our sympathies to the Sodhi family.

No one should be killed because of his religion. Even if Mr. Sodhi had been a Muslim and a follower of bin Laden, that would not justify murdering him. But what makes this crime even more disturbing is that this perception was a mistake. Mr. Sodhi was a Sikh, not Muslim.

Sikhism is an independent, monotheistic, revealed religion that believes in the equality of all people, including gender equality. It is not part of either Hinduism or Islam, yet because of the turbans they wear, which are required by their religion, Sikhs are sometimes mistaken for Muslim followers of bin Laden.

The violence has mostly ended, but there are still some unrelated violent incidents. Unfortunately, Balbir Singh Sodhi's brother was also killed just a couple of months ago in his taxicab outside San Francisco. I call for an end to all these attacks and for full and prompt prosecution of all the people responsible.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to place the Council of Khalistan's recent press release on the anniversary of September 11 into the RECORD at this time.

IN MEMORY OF THOSE KILLED IN LAST YEAR'S ATTACK ON UNITED STATES

SIKHS SUFFERED THE MOST AFTER THE ATTACKS; COUNCIL OF KHALISTAN CONDEMNS ATTACKS, CALLS FOR END TO VIOLENCE AGAINST MINORITIES

WASHINGTON, D.C., September 11, 2002.—Dr. Gurmit Singh Aulakh, President of the Council of Khalistan, today remembered the attacks on America a year ago that killed almost 3,000 Americans. He also condemned the violence against Sikh Americans and other minorities that broke out in the wake the September 11 attacks.

"On behalf of the 21-million strong Sikh Nation and especially on behalf of more than 500,000 Sikh Americans, we remember with sadness and outrage the attacks on America a year ago and offer our prayers and sympathies on this sad anniversary to the people of the United States for the terrible attack on the United States and for the loss of life it entails," Dr. Aulakh said. "We especially pray for the families of those who have departed."

"America must do what it can to eradicate terrorism from the world," Dr. Aulakh said. "We support all the efforts to do so and we must do our part as American citizens," he said. "This sad anniversary reminds us that we stand together as a nation. We must show unity on this occasion."

"We also condemn the violence against Sikhs and other minorities that took place last year after the September 11 attacks," Dr. Aulakh said. "Sikhs suffered the most in the post-September 11 violence," he said. "The very first victim of this violence was Balbir Singh Sodhi, a Sikh gasoline station owner from the Phoenix area," he noted. "Recently, his brother was killed in his taxicab. All this violence must stop," Dr. Aulakh said.

"Nobody should be killed for his or her religion, whether Sikh, Muslim, Christian, Jewish, Hindu, or whatever religion one may follow," Dr. Aulakh said. "But it is important to note that Sikhs are not Muslims nor followers of bin Laden. We condemn bin Laden," he said. "Unfortunately, because of the turbans we are required to wear, many people mistake Sikhs for bin Laden followers," he said. "The Sikh religion is an independent, monotheistic, sovereign religion that believes in the equality of the whole human race, including gender equality," he said. "Daily we pray for the well being of the whole human race."

In the wake of the September 11 attacks, a couple of young Sikhs were attacked in Brooklyn. Sikh businesses have been stoned and cars have been burned. A Sikh boy was even shot in New York. Many Muslims and other minorities were also subjected to violent attacks.

"We hope that there will not be any more of these incidents in connection with the anniversary of the attacks. 'Violence against innocent people of any religion or ethnicity is unacceptable,'" said Dr. Aulakh. "It must be condemned and the violence must be ended."

EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF CONGRESS ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF TERRORIST ATTACKS LAUNCHED AGAINST THE UNITED STATES ON SEPTEMBER 11, 2001

SPEECH OF

HON. BART STUPAK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 2002

Mr. STUPAK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my voice to the multitude of Members honoring our Nation and its heroes on September 11, 2002.

Mr. Speaker, although I was back in my district taking part in events commemorating the impact September 11th has had on all of us, I would have voted "Yes" on passage of H. Con. Res. 464. Due to a technical mixup, my name was not added as a cosponsor of this worthy bill, and I wish to state my intention here that I fully support this resolution and its sentiments.

As a former law enforcement officer, I know too well the toll such tragedy takes on individuals—their lives, their families, their future, and I know too well how difficult, yet how necessary it is to ensure like-minded individuals are prevented from carrying out further attacks.

This resolution makes it clear that while the passage of a year has not softened our memories, it has shown that we will not bow down to terrorism.

We must find those responsible for the deaths of so many—including my constituent Army Major Kip Taylor who perished in the Pentagon on that day a year ago—and ensure they face the consequences of their actions.

September 11 brought out the worst in our enemies. Yet it also brought out the best in our citizens. That is what we are honoring today.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, September 18, 2002

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Reverend Dr. Eric Anthony Joseph, Chaplain and Dean, Langston University, Oklahoma, offered the following prayer:

The Biblical psalmist says, "I will make Your name to be remembered in all generations; therefore the people shall praise You forever and ever" (Psalm Chapter 45:16 and 17).

Let us ask God to govern our hearts and minds and Nation as we pray:

Dear heavenly Father, in a world in which many would claim our allegiance and seek our praise, we recognize that You alone are worthy of our praise.

For since the first Continental Congress opened in 1774 with 2½ hours of prayer, various ministers and guest chaplains and politicians have graced this transit House to appeal to You, as our sovereign Lord, to play an integral role in the Government of our then young Nation.

In 1789 we had 65 House Members and 26 Senators. In 1800 we moved the seat of power to the District of Columbia near the residence of our first President, General George Washington; and since 1911 we have grown to 435 House Members and today we have 100 Senators.

Therefore, Lord, as we grow as one Nation under Your providential jurisdiction, we beseech You to give these anointed House Members and servants to Thy people the fruit of Your omnipotent Holy Spirit.

May the House of Congress serve with love, joy, peace, patience, goodness, kindness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control, as well as justice, humility, and compassion.

Guide and bless these men and women who have been elected by Your grace to direct us to the center of Your will. We openly ask these things in the name of Your Son, the living Saviour and Lord, Jesus the Christ. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Monahan, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate has passed bills of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 210. An act to authorize the integration and consolidation of alcohol and substance abuse programs and services provided by Indian tribal governments, and for other purposes.

S. 1344. An act to provide training and technical assistance to Native Americans who are interested in commercial vehicle driving careers.

S. 2017. An act to amend the Indian Financing Act of 1974 to improve the effectiveness of the Indian loan guarantee and insurance program.

WELCOMING DR. ERIC ANTHONY JOSEPH

(Mr. ISTOOK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. ISTOOK. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and my honor to welcome today our guest chaplain, Dr. Eric Anthony Joseph, the chaplain of Langston University in Langston, Oklahoma, which is in my congressional district in our State. Langston University is named for the first African-American office holder in American history, and of course it is one of the premier Historically Black Colleges and Universities about which we will be honoring today with a special resolution.

Dr. Joseph is a man of learning, a man of experience, and a man of strong faith. He has received many degrees, including a doctorate of philosophy in intercultural education, a Masters of Divinity, a Masters of Arts in Christian education, a Bachelor of Arts in Communication, and two fine arts degrees.

Dr. Joseph has used his talents in a variety of ways to help bring people closer together and closer to God. He has served as a minister, a teacher, a chaplain, as a consultant, an athlete, and as a writer. Dr. Joseph has dedicated his life to ministering to people and strengthening their faith.

I join the Speaker and all of our colleagues in welcoming today Dr. Eric Anthony Joseph to the U.S. House of Representatives; and I thank him for his service, his leadership, and providing us this day with our opening prayer.

UNFETTERED INSPECTIONS IN IRAQ

(Mr. FOLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, Saddam Hussein has said he will let weapons inspectors into Iraq and the United Nations; and the world community says, all right. He is agreeing and he is cooperating.

Well, we have been down that road before. Saddam Hussein years ago promised unfettered inspections. However, when the inspectors got there, they were told, not now, not at night, not in the palaces, not in certain locations, not where we do not want you to go.

President Bush laid out a compelling argument to the United Nations on the need for forcible inspections; and if that does not change the attitude of Saddam Hussein, then that regime must go. They are in violation of the United Nations Council. They have violated numerous articles, and they need to be brought to bear the responsibility that the United Nations has in this effort.

Now, if we are going to continue to pay dues to this organization, we better expect and demand, as the President suggested, that they play a vital role and a meaningful role in world affairs. If they are going to just sit there and gather in New York for cocktails and coffee, then what is the point of spending millions and billions of dollars to keep the organization alive?

Saddam Hussein is a menace. He has proven it so. Let us fight with the President.

EDUCATING COMMUNITIES ON MISSING AND EXPLOITED CHILDREN

(Mr. LAMPSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAMPSON. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow in Texas I am co-hosting on the Beaumont Police Department and the Jefferson County Sheriff's Academy a seminar on missing-and-exploited-children cases. And while we work here in Washington to pass legislation to protect children at home and across America, I also think it is important for us to make sure that our law enforcement officers have the training that they need.

The seminar is a day-long event run in conjunction with the National Center For Missing and Exploited Children. The first 3 hours of the seminar will cover topics regarding the duties of the first responder and law enforcement resources. In the latter 4 hours, we will discuss the investigation of crimes against children with specific emphasis on physical and sexual abuse, abduction and missing children.

Sixty-nine officers will attend this conference, and that is 69 officers who will be better equipped to deal with the terrible call from a parent saying, My child is missing.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that passing legislation is not our only duty as Members of Congress. I also believe that we must work to educate and assist our communities. This is a great first start.

PASSING A RESPONSIBLE BUDGET

(Mr. WILSON of South Carolina asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, when American families face difficult times, they set priorities. Today the United States is fighting a war and facing a slow economy. These are difficult times, and they call for clear priorities. President Bush and Republicans have done just that.

In March, Republicans in the House, led by the gentleman from Illinois (Speaker HASTERT), passed the President's budget plan that clearly outlined spending priorities.

We are keeping our commitment to education, Social Security, Medicare and, most importantly, national defense and homeland security. But Democrats have offered no plans and have set no priorities. The only clear message coming from them is let us spend more.

We must focus on what we need, not what we want. The American people have been consistent in making the economy their top concern. The President and respected Alan Greenspan have said that the way to promote a strong economy is to control government spending. The President and Republicans have presented a responsible budget that meets our Nation's priorities. It is time for the Democrats to get on board.

HONORING JULIA FAIRFAX

(Mr. DAVIS of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, as a graduate of a historically black college, I too want to add my welcome to our guest chaplain, Dr. Eric Joseph. But I really rise to pay tribute to a grand lady of my community, Miss Julia Fairfax, 93 years old, who passed away just last week.

The amazing thing about her, though, is she was actively engaged and involved with all levels of community activity up until about 6 months ago. A grand lady, a grand dame, a lady that we shall always remember, admire and respect, Miss Julia Fairfax.

FIXING BROKEN BANKRUPTCY LAWS

(Mr. PITTS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PITTS. Mr. Speaker, for more than 5 years Congress has been working to fix our Nation's broken bankruptcy laws. And now when we are just 1 yard from the line, one Senator's extremist views on abortion have placed this bill in jeopardy. I still have not found anyone who can explain to me what abortion has to do with bankruptcy. Nevertheless, there it is, right in the middle of the bill, language that would single out peaceful, nonviolent pro-life protesters for unique punishment while leaving other debtors unaffected.

Mr. Speaker, this is completely wrong. We believe in treating people equally in this country, no matter what their politics, no matter what they believe.

Well, no one should be surprised that this bill is now in jeopardy. Fifty-five of us have been on record since May saying that we could not support this bill if it contained the Senate's poison pill.

Mr. Speaker, we need to fix this bill first by taking out the abortion language and then pass it.

WHAT IS SADDAM HUSSEIN HIDING?

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, since the end of the Persian Gulf War, Iraq has violated U.N. sanctions and resolutions 16 times. Sixteen times they have thumbed their nose at the United Nations and their resolutions.

Now, I commend President Bush on addressing these issues with the United Nations last Thursday. It is time to enforce all United Nations resolutions, and it is time to put weapons inspectors back in Iraq with unfettered access. This hard line must be taken.

Iraq cannot be given another decade to comply. All U.N. resolutions must be enforced, and this cannot be negotiable.

Mr. Speaker, if Iraq has no weapons of mass destruction, then what are they afraid of? If Iraq complied with the United Nations' resolutions, sanctions would be lifted; and they could make $120 billion a year in their oil sales; but Saddam Hussein has foregone $120 billion a year to hide something. We must have U.N. inspectors inside Iraq, and they must have complete access to see everything to see just what Saddam Hussein is hiding from the rest of the world.

NO MORE IRAQI OIL

(Mr. REHBERG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REHBERG. Mr. Speaker, America is at war against terrorists; yet, we buy our oil from nations that harbor the very same terrorists our sons and daughters bravely fight.

In the first 6 months of this year, America gave Saddam Hussein a staggering $2.3 billion for Iraqi oil. I do not want to send my 18-year-old son or the sons and daughters of the people of Montana to the Middle East to fight for terrorist oil, especially when we have oil available here at home.

Mr. Speaker, we need to unify as Americans, pass a comprehensive and balanced energy plan that reduces our dependence on oil sold by terrorists. We must stop bankrolling the very terrorists that our men and women are fighting currently.

We have bought enough Iraqi oil. No more.

DECLARING WAR ON IRAQ

(Mr. PENCE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, when the USS Maine was detonated in the harbor of Havana, Cuba, and the United States of America believed Spain to be responsible, we did not pass a resolution in this body authorizing the use of force for a regime change in Spain. We declared war on Spain and we won.

When Pearl Harbor was decimated through a dastardly attack by the imperial government and military of Japan, we did not pass a resolution authorizing a regime change in this Congress. We declared war on Japan.

Now, in the wake of 9/11, when there is enormous circumstantial evidence to suggest complicity with al Qaeda and Iraq, we are about to debate a resolution authorizing military force for a regime change, seemingly unwilling to use the term "declare war," discharging our constitutional duty.

Mr. Speaker, can a Nation that does not possess the courage to use a word possess the will to wage a war? If the facts are there to prove complicity with terrorism and al Qaeda, and even with 9/11, the nation of Iraq, let us do no less than our duty. Let us pass a resolution to declare war.

WELFARE REFORM

(Mr. CUNNINGHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, in 1993, we took up the welfare reform bill. Many on the other side fought the welfare reform bill, but I want my colleagues to know that the events that took place and the successes of welfare, I had a meeting with over 100 men and women that had been previously welfare recipients in San Diego. Every single one of them lauded the bipartisan support of that welfare bill.

I had a doctor who came to my office and said that a lad with a 14-, a 13-, and a 12-year-old girl. The 14-year-old had two children. The 13-year-old had a child. The 12-year-old, the mother wanted to know what was wrong because her 12-year-old could not have a child. We changed those kinds of things and bettered it for children.

What we are asking is for the other body to take up the welfare reform bill that has helped millions of low income Americans and pass the welfare bill on the Senate side. We will be taking up a resolution this week, and we hope that both sides of the aisle will help to help the people that need it the most.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DAN MILLER of Florida). The Chair would like to remind the gentleman that he should not be urging action upon the other body, the Senate, in his comments on the floor of the House.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX, the Chair will postpone further proceedings today on motions to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 6 of rule XX.

Any record votes on postponed questions will be taken tomorrow.

RECOGNIZING CONTRIBUTIONS OF HISTORICALLY BLACK COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution (H. Res. 523) recognizing the contributions of historically Black colleges and universities.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. RES. 523

Whereas there are 105 historically Black colleges and universities in the United States;

Whereas historically Black colleges and universities provide the quality education so essential to full participation in a complex, highly technological society;

Whereas historically Black colleges and universities have a rich heritage and have played a prominent role in American history;

Whereas historically Black colleges and universities have allowed many students to attain their full potential through higher education;

Whereas the achievements and goals of historically Black colleges and universities are deserving of national recognition; and

Whereas the third week in September is an appropriate time to express that recognition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved,

(3) commends the Nation's historically Black colleges and universities for their commitment to academic excellence for all students, including low-income and educationally disadvantaged students;

(4) urges the presidents, faculty, and staff of the Nation's historically Black colleges and universities to continue their efforts to recruit, retain, and graduate students who might otherwise not pursue a postsecondary education;

(5) recognizes the significance of title III of the Higher Education Act, which aids in strengthening the academic quality, institutional management, and financial stability of historically Black colleges and universities; and

(6) requests that the President issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States and interested groups to demonstrate support for historically Black colleges and universities in the United States during that week with appropriate ceremonies, activities, and programs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BOEHNER) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. OWENS) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BOEHNER).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on H. Res. 523.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) for introducing this important resolution, and I appreciate his efforts to recognize the importance of historically Black colleges and universities.

HBCUs, as they are known, were created more than 150 years ago to provide African Americans with access to higher education, and currently there are 105 historically Black colleges and universities across the United States. In my State of Ohio, there are two HBCUs, Wilberforce and Central State Universities, that provide an invaluable education to the youth of Ohio.

While comprising only 3 percent of our Nation's 2- and 4-year institutions, HBCUs are responsible for producing 28 percent of all bachelors' degrees and 15 percent of all masters' degrees and 17 percent of all first professional degrees earned by African Americans.

In 1998, Congress enacted the Higher Education Amendments to make improvements to programs designed to help HBCUs strengthen their institutions and graduate and professional programs under the Higher Education Act, and these changes included allowing institutions to use Federal money to build their own endowments and to provide scholarships and fellowships for graduate and professional students.

Since 1995, Congress has increased its financial support of HBCUs by 89 percent, and President Bush's fiscal year 2003 budget, passed by this House in March, included more than $213 million, a $7 million increase over the current fiscal year, to strengthen HBCUs across the country.

Mr. Speaker, over the last 2 years leaders here in Congress have continued to demonstrate their commitment to historically Black colleges and universities. The Committee on Education and the Workforce has visited a number of HBCU campuses within the last year to consider the issues and concerns of minority-serving institutions to better address their needs through Federal education programs. Tomorrow we will continue our series of hearings on this very important topic.

Finally, I would like to thank and commend my colleagues on the Committee on Education and the Workforce, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. HOEKSTRA), the gentleman from California (Mr. MCKEON), the gentleman from California (Mr. GEORGE MILLER), the ranking Democrat, the gentleman from New York (Mr. OWENS) and others for their leadership on this issue and for their tireless efforts in promoting HBCUs in the House.

I want to urge my colleagues today to vote yes on this important resolution. It is my goal and the goal of the Committee on Education and the Workforce to build on the record of academic excellence of students attending these universities and colleges. This resolution honors their important work done at HBCUs and encourages all students to attend college and prepare for the challenges and opportunities of the 21st century.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I might consume.

I am pleased to join my colleagues in honoring the contributions of our Nation's historically Black colleges and universities. I am a graduate of Morehouse College and of Atlanta University, both historically Black colleges.

I think it is very important to note that in the constellation of the higher education world in America, these 105 historically Black colleges and universities are only a small part. There are more than 3,000 colleges and universities in the United States at this point. It is very important that we understand the value of this treasure that we have in this collection of colleges.

Our Nation continues to struggle with a great gap in college opportunity. Only 59 percent of African American high school graduates enroll in college, compared to 66 percent of white high school graduates. I am not going to stand here and pretend that the bulk of the African American students who do go to college are going to go to historically Black colleges and universities. That is not the case. We have more students enrolled, of course, in other institutions. However, these institutions have a special role in going after an underserved, hard-to-reach group.

Historically Black colleges and universities have a unique track record of success in expanding college opportunity for those who would normally not get the opportunity or, given the opportunity, would need special assistance. Historically Black colleges and universities enroll 16 percent of all African American college students, but they are responsible for a full 40 percent of African American college graduates.

The greater percentage of African Americans that get Ph.D.s are far greater among the graduates of historically Black colleges and universities. They have developed innovative academic strategies, supported cutting-edge research and helped to launch the careers of millions of today's leaders, including scientists, doctors, teachers, lawyers, artists, entrepreneurs, community and religious leaders. They were there when there was nothing else, especially in the segregated South.

These institutions were created out of the efforts of local people using very basic grassroots methods. Sometimes tuitions were paid in terms of bushels of corn or crates of eggs. They improvised and survived over the years, and even now many of these historically Black colleges and universities have a very difficult time financially. They are not secure at all. Very few of them have endowments which are adequate for the purposes of today's financing.

Despite broad bipartisan support, they still receive only 4 percent of the $29 billion in Federal funds for universities each year.

The House leadership has failed to keep its promise to move the education appropriations bill, and they have a lot at stake in that bill. Even worse, the Republican proposal includes only a 3.6 percent increase for Black colleges. Over the past 5 years, these institutions have received a 15 percent annual increase. The increase this year is far less than it was before.

We appreciate this resolution. We appreciate the special recognition being given to historically Black colleges and universities, but they are in need of substantial support.

The Republican leadership has also failed to schedule H.R. 1606, which is the gentleman from South Carolina's (Mr. CLYBURN) bill to preserve historic landmarks on Black college campuses. H.R. 1606 was approved by the Committee on Resources and has been on the House calendar since June. We would like to see some action on that.

The House has not even held any hearings on H.R. 1162, even though it has 120 sponsors. H.R. 1162 is a comprehensive initiative of minority-serving colleges introduced by the gentleman from California (Mr. GEORGE MILLER).

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS), the chairman of the Republican conference.

Mr. WATTS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House today recognizes the importance and the significance of the 105 historically Black colleges and universities in America, commonly referred to as HBCUs.

One-third of all black students in college go to HBCUs. These distinguished institutions of higher learning place doctors, lawyers, legislators, educators, business owners, community leaders and America's black middle class into the mainstream of society. What were once the only options for Americans of African descent to receive post secondary education are now attractive options where students can learn in a rich, historic environment.

So many young citizens have been given the opportunity to attain their full potential because of HBCUs. Many of them are from underserved communities. These are students who may have never had the chance to go to college were it not for the presence of historically Black colleges and universities in their respective States around the country.

As one that used to play a little football, I am particularly thankful to HBCUs for producing the first black player to be drafted in the National Football League, Paul "Tank" Younger. About 100 NFL players right now have HBCU roots, including the Tennessee Titans' very distinguished quarterback Steve McNair, a fantastic quarterback who hails from Alcorn State in Mississippi.

Congress, both Democrats and Republicans, has recognized the importance of historically Black colleges and universities and voted to increase funding by 41 percent over the next 5 years. President Bush has continued this dedication by supporting similar increases so many more students can aspire to achieve their hopes and their dreams.

As most of the presidents of HBCUs from around the Nation gather in Washington this week, it is fitting to showcase the many benefits derived from a unique and distinguished network of schools. This resolution urges the White House to issue a proclamation calling on others to support HBCUs with appropriate activities, ceremonies, financial contributions and programs.

Nearly half a million students attend historically Black colleges and universities. We must do everything possible to further promote their role in higher education and the contributions they make to better the lives of so many young Americans. I urge the House to adopt this important resolution.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS).

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but recall a number of years ago when I, as a 16-year-old, left home to go to the University of Arkansas at Pine Bluff. Not a university at that time, it was Arkansas AM&N College. I recall having $20 in my pocket, scared as I could possibly be, having never been away from home that much; but I also remember being able to go and register on credit. I also recall being able to purchase books and borrow them with virtually no money.

Then as time went on, I have six brothers and sisters who also attended the University of Arkansas at Pine Bluff, four nieces and nephews. Then I look around in my office in terms of people to work with and for me, there are seven individuals who work with me who have attended Historically Black Colleges and Universities, Wilberforce, Morehouse, Howard, UAPB, Jackson State. The reality is that for thousands and thousands of individuals, without these institutions being available, well equipped, ready, prepared, many of the individuals who have managed to rise above the individuality of their circumstances would have never been able to do so.

So I commend my colleague for introducing the resolution. I also share the comments of my colleague from New York who suggests that the best way to pay tribute to these institutions is to make sure they have adequate resources, that they are adequately funded, that there are resources to rebuild, in some instances, their infrastructures. Some of them I have visited their campuses, and they are seriously in need of repair. Some of them have virtually no equipment.

Mr. Speaker, as we pay tribute, the best way to do that is to make sure that these institutions are able to continue to grow, to develop, to thrive, and provide the opportunity for the thousands and thousands of students who otherwise would not be able to make it.

Mr. Speaker I rise in support of H. Res. 523, Recognizing the Contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. There are about 105 historically black colleges and universities in the United States—the first being Cheyney University of Pennsylvania, which was founded in 1837. This measure commends the Nation's historically black colleges and universities for their commitment to educating all students, including low-income and educationally disadvantaged students, and recognizes the significance of title III of the Higher Education Act (PL 105-244), which strengthens the academic quality, management and financial stability of historically Black higher-education institutions. Also, the Black land-grant institutions in which the U.S. Congress had to pass a second Morrill Act in 1890 designed to provide equal educational opportunities for Black students who had been denied admission to their States' original 1862 land-grant universities. The 1890 institutions are a subset of the HBCUs whose mission is teaching, research, and extension and the continual education of young men and women to be self-sufficient.

Harry Truman, the 33rd President of the United States of America said, "We have to make it possible for every person to develop himself to the extent of his capacity and will, and no barriers should stand in the way; not for his or her sake, but for the sake of all of us."

The one true measure of a nation's success is its ability to engage all of its citizens in the ever changing and transformation of a technology-based global economy. Cultural diversity, acceptance of differences, equal opportunity, shared economic prosperity—the ideals of the American way—must shift from being desired national objectives, to being absolutely crucial ones if the country wants to continue to be the most powerful, wealthiest, and freest nation in the world. To accomplish these goals America must face and overcome the tremendous task of educating all segments of its population. No group's educational potential can be neglected in this competitive global arena. The cost of ignorance is too great to ignore, neglect, and accept in order to build a stronger, and wealthier nation, otherwise to do so would deprive the economy of critical human resources and to incur costs to society—the costs of supporting those not capable of earning a living wage.

Many African-American young people find themselves at a disadvantage by being victims of poverty and other social ills in their attempt to better themselves by seeking a higher education. Fortunately, the Nation has in place a network of institutions. Historically Black Colleges and Universities, HBCUs. Traditionally, the predominantly Black institutions have attracted students mainly from the Black community.

In the past, much of the existence and origin of HBCUs can be attributed to the Civil War between April 1861 to April 1865 which was the single most important factor leading to the creation of conditions favorable for the establishment, growth, and development of educational institutions for the Negro in southern States. The end of the war marked the close of an era of 246 years (1619-1865) when the Negro in the South was in slavery—an era when in several southern States it was a crime to provide education or training in a useful trade or profession to a Negro. After the Civil War the men of the 62nd and 65th U.S. Missouri Regiment of Colored Infantry from the Union Army contributed $6,380 to establish Lincoln University of Missouri in 1866, one of the oldest predominately Black landgrant institutions. These young brave veterans of war wanted to develop an institution with a purpose to address poor Black students having access to an education. The committed founders of Lincoln initiated a national desire among churches, citizen groups, individuals, and State legislatures to develop and build educational institutions for their students to have access to quality affordable education and to address racial segregation in southern States.

I am a graduate of the Arkansas Agricultural, Mechanical, and Normal College, which is a 1890 land-grant institution known today as University of Arkansas at Pine Bluff. The HBCUs constitute some of the largest and most prestigious institutions of higher education in the nation. Several of the 1890s offer doctoral degrees and/or professional degrees in engineering, food science, toxicology, environmental science, and other areas of national need. Six public HBCUs produce nearly 20 percent of African-American bachelor degree recipients in engineering and the 1890s graduate over 80 percent of all Black recipients of bachelor degrees in agricultural sciences. Tuskegee University alone has trained more than 80 percent of the Nation's African-American veterinarians. These universities have been in the forefront of educating youth-at-risk, producing research vital to the quality of life and the environment, and addressing the social and economic needs of inner cities and rural communities. The HBCUs contributions must be commended because they with limited funding and resources have done an outstanding job and have made significant improvements in the range and level of academic performance and research programs. Our HBCUs must have increase funding to continue to serve the at-risk youth, low-income, and disadvantaged students in our country. After all, "a mind is a terrible thing to waste."

Mr. Speaker, I urge all my colleagues to support H. Res. 523, Recognizing the Contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities.

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. ISAKSON), a member of Committee on Education and the Workforce.

Mr. ISAKSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time, and I particularly thank the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) for introducing this important resolution.

Two miles south of my district and in the city of my birth, Atlanta, Georgia, the largest collection of Historically Black Colleges and Universities resides in America, Spellman, Morris Brown, Morehouse College, and the Morehouse School of Medicine, the largest collection of institutions anywhere in the world.

They have contributed greatly to the United States of America, not the least of which the most recent president of Morehouse School of Medicine, Dr. Louis Sullivan and the former Secretary of Health and Human Services under President Bush and the previous administration. But they have also contributed to my life. My doctor, Dr. Roaj Ujgin is a graduate of Morehouse School of Medicine and a friend who has helped me on many occasions, both personally and with my health.

These colleges and universities, which rose out of a tremendous need, have grown to be a major component of parity in the education and production of graduates who contribute to our country. I commend this Congress, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS), the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BOEHNER), and the gentleman from New York (Mr. OWENS) for the great tribute they are paying to those institutions today. Most importantly, I thank those institutions for the contribution they make to us.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all Americans to join in the support of their foundations and efforts for future growth.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from the District of Columbia (Ms. NORTON).

Ms. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time, and I thank the distinguished chairman and the distinguished ranking member for bringing this important resolution to the floor. I rise in strong support of House Resolution 523 because it recognizes the major role that Historically Black Colleges and Universities have played and continue to play in the education of African Americans and people of all racial and ethnic identities.

I emphasize that the HBCUs have always been open to people of all races and have always educated people of all racers. We are fortunate in the District of Columbia to have two great HBCUs here, Howard University and the University of the District of Columbia.

Most Members know something about Howard, so I want to discuss the University of the District of Columbia, one of the oldest HBCUs, but the last to be funded as an HBCU. Even though it has long been a HBCU, the UDC was funded only in 1999. That occurred as part of a bill passed by this House, the College Access Act, where this House decided that because D.C. only had one university, an open-admissions university, that District students ought to be able to go to any public institution in the United States at low in-state tuition and to private universities here in the city and in the region.

There were some at the UDC who believed that opening higher education to more students would undermine UDC itself. The fact is the opposite has occurred. There is now new interest in UDC, not only because it is now a funded HBCU, but because there is new interest in college education in the District of Columbia.

Talking about going to college and about the College Access Act has had the effect of raising the profile of the University of the District of Columbia. At its lowest point in 1997, we did not know if the UDC, which had been the step-child of education in the District of Columbia, was going to continue. Now, in no small part because of the College Access Act, which has helped us to market college education in the District of Columbia, there has been a 13 percent increase in enrollment at this newest of the funded HBCUs, the University of the District of Columbia.

It would have been tragically wrong to restrict D.C. students given this opportunity of going to colleges, public colleges anywhere in the United States. That is the kind of zero-sum game you never want to play, especially with higher education.

Fortunately, and to their credit, the students at UDC and the faculty understood and supported the College Tuition Access Act to open public universities to all our residents. Now we understand that having done that, we have increased enrollment at our own State university. We are pleased, therefore, to support this resolution.

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. MORELLA).

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time and for bringing this bill to the floor. I thank my colleagues on the Committee on Education and the Workforce on both sides of the aisle, and I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) for bringing this issue to the floor.

Of course, I rise in support of H. Res. 523, which recognizes the contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS). For the last 3 years he has brought the presence of Historically Black Colleges and Universities here to the Capitol where we have been able to discuss issues of importance in terms of promoting the work that is being done at these colleges and universities.

Currently, there are 105 Historically Black Colleges and Universities that have all provided quality education, specifically in the fields of technology. Historically Black Colleges and Universities have played a prominent role in American history, have enabled thousands of students to obtain their full potential through higher education. Currently over half a million students attend HBCUs, and almost 60 percent are female.

Financial support for Historically Black Colleges and Universities has increasingly been a problem since enrollment over the past 10 years has been double compared to the national average. In Maryland, there are four Historically Black Colleges and Universities, Bowie State University, Coppin State University, Morgan State University, and the University of Maryland Eastern Shore.

One of the greatest issues facing our Nation this decade will be the pressing need to ensure that U.S. workers are prepared to compete in the technology-driven workforce of the future. As we enter the 21st century, U.S. jobs continue to grow fastest in areas that require knowledge and skills stemming from a strong grasp of science and technology. In fact, the Bureau of Labor Statistics has estimated that of the top 10 fastest-growing occupations, the top five are computer related.

Now more than ever, it is important that we cultivate the scientific and technical talents of all citizens, not just those who have traditionally worked in these fields. Today women, minorities, and persons with disabilities constitute a little more than two-thirds of the U.S. workforce, and yet their presence in the science and technology fields remains unacceptably low. As a result, the largest pool of potential workers continues to be isolated from science, engineering, and technology careers. While this is a challenge facing all institutions of higher learning, Historically Black Colleges and Universities have led the way to educating the under-represented minorities in those science, engineering, and technology fields. There is a disproportionate positive contribution that HBCUs have made to the development of the Nation's technical talent.

The National Science Foundation data indicates that HBCUs account for nearly one out of three science and engineering degrees granted to African Americans. In addition, a high percentage of African Americans who go on to pursue an advanced degree in the science, engineering, and technology fields receive their undergraduate degrees at Historically Black Colleges and Universities.

In 1998, I introduced legislation, which became law, creating the Commission on the Advancement of Women and Minorities in Science, Engineering and Technology Development. The purpose of the commission was to look at why women and minorities are not pursuing an education or career in the science and technology fields at the same rate as their traditionally white, male counterparts.

The commission felt that, if we continue to fail these groups in their quest to prepare for and participate in the new, technology-driven economy, we put at risk our Nation's economic and intellectual preeminence. One of the major recommendations of the commission was to establish a nongovernmental organization to serve as a clearinghouse of very best practices for educating all ages of women and minority in the SET fields and also to provide grants for carrying out their best practices.

On that call to action, the BEST initiative was formed. BEST: building, engineering and science talents. It was launched in September 2001 as a public-private partnership. The features that set BEST apart from other initiatives are its national scope, its comprehensive and systematic approach, its engagement of public and private sector leaders, and its vision of aligning key groups that make up America's under-represented majority.

As co-chairs of the National Leadership Council of BEST, the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) and I have looked to the leadership of HBCUs. Nationally recognized scholars and practitioners from HBCUs are participating in our blue ribbon panels on BEST practices. Two that have made important contributions are Dean Orlando Taylor of Howard University and Professor Melvin Webb of Clark Atlanta University.

Historically Black Colleges and Universities play an integral role in ensuring that we meet our Nation's technology and labor needs. By providing students with access to technology and engineering education, they will not only be prepared to use the technology required in most jobs today, but will also be encouraged to pursue careers on the technology forefront.

Mr. Speaker, these prestigious institutions of higher learning deserve our highest honors, and I join the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) and others in this Chamber in supporting this legislation and urge passage.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HOLT).

Mr. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in supporting H. Res.

523, recognizing the contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) and the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) for bringing this forward because it is a good recognition of the thousands of young Americans who have received quality education at the more than 100 HBCUs around the country, a long and distinguished history that we recognize here today.

□ 1045

The HBCUs have created higher educational opportunities where none existed and launched the careers of millions of scientists, doctors, teachers, educators, and lawyers. HBCUs are responsible for a full 40 percent of African American college graduates. So these are schools that are important for not just a subgroup, and they are of far more than historical importance. They are critical for our society's and our economy's functioning today. Historically Black Colleges and Universities have produced the majority of black professionals in the Nation, and the adoption of this resolution will affirm the United States' support of these institutions and critical contributions that their alumni make to our society.

But it is worth pointing out that we must go beyond empty words of praise. We must, this year, work to restore the purchasing power of Pell grants. We must increase the supplemental equal opportunity grants by really several hundred million dollars if we are truly going to pay respect to and help the HBCUs. We should be increasing Federal work study by several hundred million dollars. We should keep and, in fact, enhance the program leveraging educational assistance partnerships to help with State scholarships. I cannot fail to point out that although we do not know what will be in the appropriations bill coming up, we do know what the President has requested and what the Committee on Appropriations is working with and that is what would for HBCUs be, in effect, a cut in Federal funding. Yes, it is a small increase, but it is not an increase that keeps up with inflation.

So I ask my colleagues to support H. Res. 523, recognizing the contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. I praise the dedicated work of the teachers and administrators of these schools. But I ask my colleagues to go beyond words of praise and provide real resources to allow HBCUs to achieve their promise and to allow the students of these colleges and universities to achieve their promise.

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. CUNNINGHAM).

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution. Most of my life I have been in education. I was a teacher and a coach, both in high school and in college. I have seen what a good education can do. For my parents, who never missed a single event either athletic or academic that my brother and I went to, so the responsiveness of the families is critical. The President, to have a President that focuses on education and leaving no child behind. I fully believe that if a child qualifies to go to college, there should be no child whether it is a historically black college or any group, that should be left behind. Because the consequences are a devilment themselves.

I have a friend in San Diego, Bishop McKinney. He has actually come back and testified. He runs a program for African-American students. These children are at-risk students. If someone did not pick up the gauntlet and did not take care of these children, they would get left behind. Bishop McKinney has a private school that depends on private contributions. But I want to tell you that over 90 percent of those children, men and women, qualify to go to college. So Bishop McKinney, the Jaime Escalantes that say, hey, we can teach children are heroes.

It is not just the college itself that is important, it is the whole effort. It is the funding that my colleague mentioned a moment ago. Since 1998, we have increased education by 40 percent in this body, mostly in a bipartisan way. I want to thank the gentleman from California (Mr. GEORGE MILLER) and the chairman for working out the agreements that we have had recently. It is some of the most bipartisan legislation that we have had. But it also takes dedicated teachers at a lower level, not just 100,000 teachers but 100,000 qualified teachers that work with the children every single day. Those dedicated teachers should be paid more. They hold in their hands the lives not just of our children but society itself, because if that child is left behind, where are they going to end up? What is the prognosis? If you take a child in the inner city that drops out or is denied an education, they are going to end up statistically involved in crime or drugs or worse. Of that group, there is a lot of abuse, both child and spousal abuse. So it is the whole package, not just the university. You can have a university, but if you do not train the children early on and afterwards, then you have problems. It is also on the other end of it, also.

I have got a friend, Dr. Rafi, who is one of the preeminent computer scientists in the world. His books are in every college and university in the United States and many of those overseas. But when he graduated from college, his background and knowledge were not accepted within the workplace because he was a minority. He said, I'm not going to complain. I'm not going to take their devilment. I am going to prove to them that my worth is more than just the color of my skin. He took over and ran the department after a year and a half. Now his books are spread throughout. If you do not understand computer science, you can read one of his books. It is at a very elementary level of understanding, but yet it is for college students.

So it is not just the funding. It is not just the parents. It is not just the Jaime Escalantes or the Bishop McKinneys and the college itself, but it is the follow-on throughout. That is why this resolution is so important. We cannot stop short of just recognizing the university, but the whole package.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this time to repeat a plea for H.R. 1606. We have had tremendous bipartisan support for Historically Black Colleges and Universities starting in 1986 with the Higher Education Assistance Act when title 3-B was authorized and a steady stream of funding was created for historically black colleges, the first steady stream of Federal funding for the majority of these colleges. Before, there had been some land grant colleges in the South, segregated land grant colleges that were receiving Federal funding, but this created for all 105 Historically Black Colleges and Universities a steady stream of funding. During the years of the existence of title 3-B, both parties have supported increases in funds. It is an example of bipartisan cooperation that probably is unmatched in the area of education. So I have no complaint whatsoever in terms of that effort by both parties.

But I would like to make a plea for H.R. 1606. H.R. 1606 builds upon the successful program that Congress authorized in 1996 to provide Federal funds to assist in the preservation of buildings and structures that are eligible to be listed on the National Register of Historic Places and that are located on the campuses of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. We do not want Historically Black Colleges and Universities to become museums. Our fight is to keep them operating, keep them functioning and making a contribution. But they do have a museum quality, and they have a special contribution they have made to the American heritage. We would like to see that supported.

The 1996 act came about as a result of a cooperative effort by the Department of Interior and the United Negro College Fund, which identified many historic properties at the HBCUs that were threatened and in need of repair. A 1998 study had been done by the General Accounting Office, and it identified 712 historic properties at 103 of the Historically Black Colleges and Universities that were in need of assistance.

H.R. 1606, as reported by the Committee on Resources, authorizes the appropriation of such sums as may be necessary to carry out this historic preservation program. The bill also provides that the grantee must provide from funds derived from non-Federal sources an amount that is equal to 30 percent of the total cost of the project for which the grant is provided. H.R. 1606 enjoyed significant support in Congress and among the African American community. The bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Resources on May 22, 2002, and has been pending on the House calendar since the committee report was filed on June 20, 2002. I would like to make a plea from both sides of the aisle to support the placing on the calendar and bringing to the floor a vote for H.R. 1606, the preservation of historic buildings on the campuses of Historically Black Colleges and Universities.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Let me thank Chairman WATTS for this resolution today that honors the significance and the importance of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. They are unique institutions in our country that serve the African American community and populations that have been traditionally underserved. Congress' role over the last several decades in terms of providing funding to strengthen these institutions has continued to increase. As I mentioned earlier, funding for these institutions from Congress has increased some 89 percent since 1995. That does not include the $7 million increase that is called for by the President in this fiscal year's appropriation bills. When we finally come to some resolution on these, I fully expect that that number will be met in the appropriations process.

As I said before, these are unique institutions, and they deserve our support.

Ms. MILLENDER-McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me to offer my support of H. Res. 523 which recognizes the significant achievements of our nation's 105 historically Black colleges and universities.

For more than 100 years, historically Black colleges and universities have educated, guided and nurtured generations of this country's preeminent scholars, physicians, educators, business and other professionals. In particular, historically Black colleges and universities have educated and opened the doors of higher education to scores of economically disadvantaged students who might not otherwise have had access to a college or graduate degree.

Today, I want to remind my colleagues of the critical importance of Title III of the Higher Education Act which shores up the academic quality, financial health and administrative capacity of traditionally Black educational institutions.

It is my hope that the President will support H. Res. 523 by issuing a proclamation that will inform and motivate citizens and organizations nationwide to similarly demonstrate support for our historically Black colleges and universities.

Mr. RODRIGUEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H. Res. 523, a resolution that recognizes the many contributions of historically Black colleges and universities to American society. The 105 historically Black colleges and universities throughout the United States provide a diverse community of students with a high caliber and quality education, a necessary tool in our competitive workforce. Not only do these campuses foster a strong history of educational achievement, they also provide students with exposure to a rich heritage and significant historical perspective.

It is imperative that all students feel that they have access to institutions with allow them to attain their full potential through the pursuit of higher education. Historically Black colleges and universities have demonstrated success throughout their 100 years of educating our youth, proving that they are worthy of our national recognition and praise. Historically Black colleges and universities have provided many economically and educationally disadvantaged students with critical educational training and guidance—necessary components to building bridges to opportunity and access. The inroads made by these institutions are empowering communities which have historically been forgotten or dismissed.

We are fortunate in the 28th Congressional District of Texas to have an outstanding institution which exemplifies the rich tradition of historically Black colleges and universities. St. Philip's College was founded in 1898 by Bishop James Steptoe Johnston of St. Philip's Episcopal Church of the West Texas Diocese. The school, which opened on March 1, 1898, began as a sewing class for girls with fewer than 20 students in a house located in the historic La Villita area in downtown San Antonio. Today, St. Philip's College has been a vibrant multi-campus institution of the Alamo Community College District, joining three other colleges—San Antonio College, Palo Alto College and Northwest Vista College—in meeting the educational needs of San Antonio's growing and diverse community. A Historically Black College and a Hispanic Serving Institution with a semester enrollment of more than 8,000, St. Philip's is among the oldest and most diverse community colleges in the nation and one of the fastest growing in Texas.

I urge the presidents, faculty, and staff at historically Black colleges and universities around the country to continue their impressive work, providing a caring, nurturing, and respectful environment in which all may learn. We must all be dedicated to the education of all of our youth, and in particular those whose families have historically been shut out of educational opportunity, for leadership and service to our Nation and global community.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to join me in proclaiming September 15–September 21, 2002, as National Historically Black Colleges and Universities week.

The quest for reasonable parity in the American social order for African Americans rests with education. It is fair to state that the HBCUs of America have been and continue to be the equal opportunity colleges and universities of the higher education institutions in America. The racial progress made socially, economically, politically and educationally by African-Americans has been made because of the existence of these institutions.

Currently, there are 118 historically black colleges and universities in the United States. A brief review of the history of education for African-Americans in this country will reveal that the HBCUs were elementary schools for the freed slaves and their progenies.

They were secondary schools for African-Americans when there was not a public education system. And HBCUs became colleges to provide higher education programs for African-Americans when the time was appropriate and education could be sustained by a critical mass of African-Americans who had graduated with secondary education achieved. They were only a group of colleges and universities which produced a critical mass of well educated African-Americans who were teachers, lawyers, doctors, ministers, social workers, pharmacists, etc. for leadership in the Black community.

Because of the existence of the schools, repressive segregated laws were challenged, our right to vote was achieved, as well as our right to participate in every facet of the American society. As such, these institutions have proven their ability to transform the prospective and quality of life for African-American citizens. They stand poised now to provide another great service to America and to African-American people.

The HBCUs are ready to respond to the call of our President to leave no child behind. We propose now to engage the HBCUs in a national urban thrust to equalize the college going rate for urban youth. In so doing, we transform urban America.

Historically Black Colleges and Universities have been proclaimed the salvation of black folks. HBCUs are credited with making higher education financially attainable for those whom otherwise would not be able to afford post-secondary education. They tout significant success rates because they are good at providing remedial preparation for students who start out with weak high-school backgrounds.

These institutions provide a supportive social, cultural and racial environment for people of color who are seeking a college education and perform a remarkable task of educating almost 85 percent of the country's Black College graduates.

Historically Black Colleges and Universities have educated 75 percent of Black Ph.D.s, 46 percent of all Black business executives, 50 percent of Black engineers, and 80 percent Federal judges. In addition, the historically Black health-professional schools have trained an estimated 40 percent of the nation's Black dentists, 50 percent of Black pharmacists and 75 percent of the nation's Black veterinarians.

HBCUs have educated an estimated 50 percent of the nation's Black attorneys and 75 percent of Black Military officers. They have produced Congressional representatives, state legislators, writers, musicians, actors, engineers, journalists, teachers, scholars, judges, pilots, activists, business leaders, lawyers and doctors.

Today I ask that my fellow members of Congress salute and acknowledge Historically Black Colleges and Universities, the presidents, faculties, staff, and trustees of the 118 institutions for their vigorous and persistent efforts in support of equal opportunity in higher education.

I also ask that Congress further commend the students who benefit from Historically Black Colleges and Universities for their pursuit of academic excellence and request that the President issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States and interested groups to conduct appropriate ceremonies, activities, and programs to demonstrate support for historically black colleges and universities in the United States.

Mrs. CHRISTENSEN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents in the United States Virgin Islands, many of whom would not have had the opportunity for a college education were it not for a Historically Black College or University, as well as my two children who are both graduates of some of these fine institutions. I am pleased to support H. Res. 523, recognizing the contributions of Historically black Colleges and Universities.

Mr. Speaker for over a century, Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCU's) have played an important role in providing opportunities for higher education to millions of African-Americans. Many of these colleges and universities were founded during the era of slavery or when American society was deeply segregated.

Although social conditions have changed radically since these colleges and universities were founded, the HBCU's have remained committed to providing African-American students with superb educational opportunities.

Almost 300,000 African Americans are currently enrolled in HBCU's, and among their alumni are Members of Congress, hundreds of elected officials, military officers, physicians, teachers, attorneys, judges, ambassadors, and business executives.

I want to particularly call your attention to the key role that these institutions play in eliminating disparities in health care.

The recent Institute of Medicine report, entitled "Unequal Treatment: Confronting Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Health Care", clearly demonstrated the need for more health care providers of racial, ethnic and linguistic backgrounds to meet the need of our increasingly diverse population as one of its major recommendations.

In the wake of anti-affirmative action movements across this country medical school enrollment in majority medical schools have dropped significantly over the last ten years. Were it not for minority health professional schools at our HBCU's the percentage of minority health care professional would be even less than the four percent currently represent across the different health professions.

Another reason for our drop in health profession students is our poor and under-supported public school system. The worst public schools and the most ignored are in communities of color. As a result, our students graduate ill prepared for college.

Only because of the commitment of our HBCU's to work with primary and secondary schools to improve student preparation and other programs designed by to remediate what is missing are our students given a chance to serve their communities in the critical area of health care and all of the others that are so important to improving our quality of life.

The Subcommittee on National Parks and Public Lands on which I serve as the Ranking Democrat, earlier this year considered and passed H.R. 1606, which was introduced by my colleague JIM CLYBURN and which I am proud to be an original cosponsor, to build upon the work started in 1996 with the passage of the historically black colleges and universities' historic preservation program.

This program has been the catalyst for the preservation of historic structures at these institutions of higher education. Unfortunately, the program has used up all of its existing authorization of funds and while its accomplishments to date have been great, the work that still needs to be done is even greater.

Many of the buildings that have been and will be assisted by this program are integral elements of the school campus and their preservation will not only preserve buildings but also the history and spirit of these pioneering institutions.

To address this problem H.R. 1606 would authorize additional appropriations for historically black colleges and universities, to decrease the matching requirement related to such appropriations. I urge my colleagues to support passage of H.R. 1606 when it comes on the floor for a vote later this month.

So I join my colleagues in recognizing these find institutions, especially the University of the Virgin Islands, in my district, for contributing immeasurably to all of our well-being.

I thank and commend my colleagues, Congressman J.C. WATTS and EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON, for their leadership in bringing H. Res. 523 to the House floor.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to join my colleagues in supporting H. Res. 523, which recognizes Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCU). Mr. Speaker, we honor the 105 HBCUs, like Morgan State University and Coppin State College, located in my district, and the 13 predominantly black institutions of higher learning, like Baltimore's Sojourner-Douglass College. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to point out that I am a graduate of Howard University, an HBCU.

This week, Presidents, Chancellors, and representatives from HBCUs attended a conference with Congressional and business leaders and members of the Administration to identify opportunities to advance HBCUs.

HBCU's have been educating students for more than 100 years by making higher education affordable to all students, especially African-Americans. HBCU's have educated almost 85% of all African-American college graduates in the United States. Throughout their history, HBCUs have served as emblems of excellence in higher education for African Americans. These institutions of higher learning have a rich history of providing quality education that have allowed many students to attain their full potential.

HBCUs have performed a remarkable task of providing the educational training for a significant number of African-American politicians, federal judges, lawyers, doctors, engineers, educators, researchers, entertainers, and business executives, thus providing an opportunity for African Americans to participate and make exemplary contributions in all walks of life.

Often acclaimed, "the salvation of black folks," HBCUs have engraved in American history the opportunity for freedom through education. The benefits of an educational experience at an HBCU are significant and cannot be duplicated. Students develop intellectually and build life skills and personal confidence about their identity, heritage, and mission to society.

This record of outstanding achievement comes despite daunting challenges—not the least of which are limited financial resources. In fact, I must note that in comparison with other colleges and universities, HBCUs are often underfunded. However, these institutions have maintained their commitment to excellence in higher learning.

Mr. Speaker, as I stated earlier, there are two HBCUs in my district of Baltimore.

Coppin State College has become a beacon in the community, working with school children, while also providing services to small businesses in cooperation with the Small Business Administration. It has also sponsored workshops, health fairs, concerts, and other activities that enable the college to serve as a repository for African-American culture.

Likewise, Morgan State University provides avenues for students to compete in the global marketplace by steering them toward nontraditional careers such as transportation at their National Transportation Center. Morgan has also become a premier institution in Maryland and the country for its engineering and science programs. These are just two examples of HBCUs working to fulfill their commitment to academic excellence.

In the continuing struggle, the course is not to dismantle or compromise the HBCU, but should be to preserve their identity and integrity. These great institutions of higher learning merit full support in continuing their missions. So, in conclusion as we honor the Nations' HBCUs, let us really show our gratitude by supporting an increase in financial resources to each HBCU when we consider the Labor, HHS, Education appropriations bill and the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act.

Mr. RILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of H. Res. 523, and to call the attention of my colleagues to one of the premier historically Black universities in the Nation, Tuskegee University. As our country celebrates a week recognizing Historically Black colleges and Universities (HBCUs), I want to take a few moments to bring to light some of the reasons I am proud to represent Tuskegee in Congress.

Since its humble beginning days under Dr. Booker T. Washington in the 1880's, Tuskegee has educated many fine leaders in a variety of fields. Militarily, Tuskegee has taken the lead in spawning many successful protectors of our country. The first African-American four star General, Daniel "Chappie" James, was educated at Tuskegee. The school has produced more African-American general officers in the military than any other institution. And most notably, Tuskegee was home to the famed Tuskegee Airmen that bravely fought for the United States in World War II.

Tuskegee has also produced that first African-American winner of the National Book Award (Ralph Ellison), and a number of African-American experts in the fields of aerospace, electrical, and chemical engineering. While achieving all these military and academic successes, Tuskegee has been able to achieve a high level of athletic excellence, as well. The men and women of Fighting Tigers athletics have made Tuskegee the Nation's winningest Historically Black College, and University.

The school currently enrolls some 3000 students, who represent most states in the country and several foreign countries. Currently, degrees are offered at the bachelor's, master's, Doctor of Veterinary Medicine, and Doctor of Philosophy (Ph.D.) levels. The students at Tuskegee receive world class educations in fields such as architecture, business, computers, engineering, liberal arts, teacher education, agricultural science, nursing, and veterinary studies. Some of its most notable programs range from studies of the Human Genome Factor to aerospace science engineering, to growing-food-in-space, and to the center for Plant Biotechnology Research. And most recently, the publication U.S. Black Engineers & Information Technology listed Tuskegee as one of the top schools in the Nation for African Americans in engineering.

Mr. Speaker, the motto of Tuskegee University is "capturing the quest for excellence in teaching, research and service." Every day on their campus in Alabama, the students, faculty, and staff of Tuskegee carry out this vision of Dr. Washington. I urge my colleagues to join me in recognizing the contributions of Tuskegee University, and of all Historically Black Colleges and Universities, by supporting H. Res. 523.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to celebrate Historically Black Colleges and Universities and their proud history of educating African-Americans for 165 years.

The contributions of HBCUs to this country are of such significance that it has become tradition for the President to proclaim a week in September as Historically Black Colleges and Universities week. This year the observance is taking place of the week of September 15th.

In the early part of the 20th century, HBCUs offered educational opportunities to blacks when most schools would not admit them. But even as the doors of other higher education institutions have opened to black students over the past few decades, HBCUs continue to offer a quality education to thousands of young Americans.

The first black college, now known as Cheyney University of Pennsylvania, was made possible by a Quaker philanthropist named Richard Humphreys who bequeathed $10,000 to establish a school to educate African-Americans. The school was founded as the Institute for Colored Youth in Philadelphia in 1837, almost 30 years before the Emancipation Proclamation would free the South's slaves. The University has since outgrown its original mandate and now offers degrees in more than 30 disciplines for people of all races.

Following the success of Cheyney University, over 100 Historically Black Colleges and Universities in the United States have been established, educating people of all races in every discipline from liberal arts to medicine to business.

It is important to note that while Historically Black Colleges and Universities comprise only about 3 percent of all colleges and universities, nearly 30 percent of all bachelor's degrees awarded each year to African Americans are earned at those institutions.

I am proud of the State of Maryland's part in this evolution of black higher education, and I am privileged to represent Bowie State University (BSU), the oldest of Maryland's four HBCUs. (The three other HBCUs located in Maryland are Morgan State and Coppin State, both in Baltimore, and the University of Maryland—Eastern Shore).

Bowie State descends from the first school opened by the Baltimore Association for the Moral and Educational Improvement of Colored People in Baltimore in 1865. BSU now has eighteen undergraduate academic programs, sixteen graduate programs at the master's level and recently established its first doctoral program in Education Leadership.

Some Historically Black Colleges and Universities are facing financial hardships and several have closed during the past few years. The Federal Government must recognize that the contributions made by these institutions have not occurred in a vacuum benefitting only a small segment of the population. Rather, the entire country has gained from the educational opportunities they offer to African-American citizens and others.

Congress and the President can acknowledge this by adequately funding the programs that support the efforts of these important institutions. The President has requested a four percent increase in funding for the Strengthening Historically Black Colleges program and the Strengthening HBCU Graduate Institutions for fiscal year 2003. This increase will do no more than help the programs keep up with inflation. As a member of the Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education Appropriations Subcommittee, I would like to see these programs receive more funding to help them continue their mission and tradition of educating African-Americans.

Marion Wright Edelman, founder of the Children's Defense Fund, said that "Education is for improving the lives of others and for leaving your community and world better than you found it."

Ms. Edelman's observation clearly illustrates how important HBCUs have been to America's black community and the Nation as a whole. Not only have they educated and improved the lives of individuals, but they have empowered those individuals to bring their knowledge back to their communities and improve the lives of others. And America is the better for it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me this week in saluting the contributions of America's Historically Black Colleges and Universities.

Mrs. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a great American, Charles B. "Chuck" Harmon, on the occasion of this Congressional Tribute to the Negro Leagues. Negro League baseball players were at the vanguard of efforts to demonstrate that what matters most is not the color of a person's skin, but character, skill, and determination. Negro League players surmounted obstacles of the day to prove their skills as ball players and the character of the American spirit.

Chuck Harmon was one of twelve children born to Sherman and Rosa Harmon on April 23, 1924 in Washington, Indiana where he completed elementary and secondary school. He attended the University of Toledo for three and one-half years between 1942 and 1949 and served with honor in the United States Navy. Mr. Harmon has been married to Daurel Woodley Harmon for 54 years and has three children, Charlene, Charles Jr., and Cheryl. He also has two grandchildren, Danielle and Justin.

Chuck Harmon was honored on May 15, 1997 by the City of Cincinnati, a day designated to honor both Jackie Robinson and Chuck Harmon on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of Jackie Robinson breaking the color barrier in Major League Baseball. The day doubled as a Golden Anniversary for Mr. Harmon, who signed his first professional baseball contract in 1947. Seven years later in 1954, Mr. Harmon broke the color barrier of the Cincinnati Reds baseball team.

Chuck Harmon has maintained courage and composure throughout many adverse situations, being the first and only African American to play on many segregated teams. Mr. Harmon's strength of character and achievements have resulted in many honors and awards. He has been honored by the Governor of Ohio, GEORGE VOINOVICH, the Greater Cincinnati Urban League, the Cities of Golf Manor, Ohio and Washington, Indiana which have named streets and a park in his honor, and a host of other sports teams for which he played. For the past 25 years, Mr. Harmon has focused on public service within the First Appellate District Court of Appeals in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Charles B. Harmon has lived a life characterized by a strict code of personal and public ethics, self respect, and respect for others. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today, and join with my congressional colleagues in congratulating player of the Negro Leagues and a great American from the State of Ohio, Charles B. "Chuck" Harmon.

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, as members of Congress, I believe it is incumbent upon us to support the efforts of Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCUs) to recruit, retain, and graduate students who otherwise might not have the opportunity to pursue a post-secondary education.

It is a known fact that Historically Black Colleges and Universities have played a vital role in giving our Nation's youth the tools necessary to forge their way in today's society. More importantly, Historically Black Colleges and Universities have provided historically disadvantaged students with the opportunity to determine for themselves how best to combine their rich cultural heritage with demands of today's scientific and technological society. Historically Black Colleges and Universities have also forged the way for all minority groups to recognize the importance of education and the need for our children to make their mark in today's world.

I would like to commend the leaders and students, both past and present, of Historically

Black Colleges and Universities for their tireless efforts in giving voice to those whose voices would have otherwise been made mute. I commend them for their perseverance and diligence. I thank them for teaching us that we can make a difference in society by remaining true to ourselves and embracing who we are.

As the only member of Congress of Samoan ancestry, I have a special affinity for the struggle of minorities. I have a special affinity for those affiliated with this Nation's Historically Black Colleges and Universities. You can believe that as long as I am a Member of Congress, I will always stand in support of historically Black Colleges and Universities and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mrs. MEEK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Resolution 523 which recognizes the contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. (HBCUs)

Education has always been key to economic opportunity in America. HBCUs have been a catalyst for educational and economic opportunity for generations of African Americans. These institutions were born of the belief that post-Civil War freedmen should become immediately educated. They continue to provide quality higher education and professional nurturing to a broad mixture of diverse individuals.

In the days of slavery, slave owners made it a point to keep slaves from reading and having access to education. One only has to read Frederick Douglas to fully comprehend what slave owners would have brought upon themselves if slaves would have received an education. Even after the Emancipation Proclamation, during the days of Jim Crow laws, there were numerous efforts to keep blacks from having access to education.

As a result of the growth and success of HBCU's, the vast majority of African Americans with bachelor's degrees in engineering, computer science, life science, business and mathematics have graduated from one of the 105 HBCUs. These graduates make up the majority of our Nation's African American military officers, physicians, Federal judges, elected officials, and business executives. The distinguished faculty members of HBCUs serve as role models and mentors, challenging students to reach their full potential.

I graduated from an historically black institution—Florida A&M University. I wanted to be a physician, but I could not attend graduate school in Florida or any other southern state—not because I lacked the qualifications to be admitted to graduate school, but simply because of the color of my skin. For those of my generation, HBCU's were our sole lifeline for economic opportunity and advancement.

Today, HBCUs remain a critical part of our education system. These institutions have significantly increased educational access for thousands of economically and socially disadvantaged Americans, particularly young African Americans.

It is wonderfully appropriate that today we honor HBCUs with our words. It is even more important that we honor them with our deeds. In our Appropriations process, we must recognize the indispensable role that HBCUs play in our educational system and fund them properly.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate our HBCUs for their record of achievement and commend Representative WATTS for offering this important resolution.

Mr. PITTS. Mr. Speaker, today, the House passed House Resolution 523, a resolution recognizing the contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCUs). Historically Black Colleges and Universities have a long, proud history of educating some of the brightest minds in America and tapping into the talent and potential of African-American students at a time in our Nation's history in which African-Americans did not enjoy the rights and freedoms of other Americans.

The 16th Congressional District of Pennsylvania is the home of two historically Black universities: Lincoln University and Cheyney University.

Lincoln University, named after President Abraham Lincoln, was founded in 1854 as an institution dedicated to providing higher education for African-American men. Lincoln University boasts several famous graduates, including renowned poet Langston Hughes and Former Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall.

Founded in 1837, as the Institute for Colored Youth, Cheyney University is the oldest historically Black university in America. Cheyney University was founded through the help of a Quaker benefactor who was committed to ensuring that African-American students could receive a high quality higher education. Cheyney University also has a long list of distinguished graduates, including "60 Minutes" journalist Ed Bradley and Philadelphia Tribune publisher and CEO Robert Bogle.

Since the founding of Lincoln and Cheyney Universities, African-Americans have achieved many important milestones in various academic disciplines. Yet, Historically Black Colleges and Universities continue to carry the mantle of African-American scholarship for future generations.

Finally, I want to commend Dr. Ivory V. Nelson, President of Lincoln University, and Dr. W. Clinton Pettus, President of Cheyney University, for their leadership and vision.

Mr. FORBES. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H. Res. 523, which recognizes the important contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. These institutions are rich sources of history and knowledge that continue to serve communities across the nation. Virginia's 4th Congressional District is home to two historically Black institutions of higher education.

Virginia State University, located near the historic center of the City of Petersburg, was founded on March 6, 1882 when the legislature passed a bill to charter the Virginia Normal and Collegiate Institute. The University's first academic year, 1883–84, saw a student body of 126 and a faculty of only seven. By the centennial year of 1982, the University was fully integrated, with a student body of nearly 5,000 and a full-time faculty of 250.

Dr. James Solomon Russell founded Saint Paul's Normal and Industrial School in 1888. In 1941 the institution was granted authority to offer a four-year degree program. In 1957 the name was changed to Saint Paul's College, the name it bears today. Saint Paul's College boasts a characteristically small college atmosphere with a student body of 600, allowing for both diversity and camaraderie.

Virginia's history and desire for academic excellence are indelibly linked to the success and achievement of these institutions. For this reason, I rise in support of this resolution to recognize the Historically Black Universities and Colleges of our Nation.

Ms. JACKSON-LEE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 523 recognizing the contributions of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. This legislation acknowledges the significance of the United States' Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCU's).

Historically Black Colleges and Universities are institutions of higher learning established prior to 1964. The principle mission of these institutions was, and is, the education of African-Americans. Toward this end, these institutions boast a proud and long-lasting tradition of producing some of the United States' most prominent African-Americans leaders and scholars, ranging from W.E.B. DuBois to Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and countless other individuals, who have devoted their lives to the service of traditionally disenfranchised communities throughout our Nation.

According to a number of sources, there are reportedly more African-American students attending HBCU's than at any other time in United States' history. In fact, as reported by the National Center for Educational Statistics, there was a 26 percent increase in HBCU enrollment between 1976 and 1994. For the years 1993 through 1994, roughly 28 percent of Black bachelor degree recipients received their degrees from Historically Black Colleges and Universities. With regards to this time span, Historically Black Colleges and Universities were responsible for awarding another 15 percent African-American master degree recipients, 9 percent of blacks earning a doctorate, and 16 percent of black professional degree recipients.

The State of Texas has been fortunate to have these Historically Black Colleges and Universities educate a significant portion of its residents and other students from a wide array of places throughout the world. From Texas' first Black college, Paul Quinn College, to colleges and universities such as Prairie View A&M University, Texas Southern University, and Wiley College, historically Black institutions throughout the State still play a critical role in the granting of undergraduate, graduate, and professional degrees to minorities. Due to the existence of these institutions, Prairie View A&M University has made a significant contribution to the preparation of many of Texas' minority educators, and Texas Southern University has played an enormous role in educating many Black attorneys and pharmacists.

Overall, as these institutions continue progressing toward claiming their stake in the mainstream of U.S. education, their missions and purposes for existing become more inclusive, as these important institutions adjust to the changing demographic compositions of their student bodies. It is a fact that more students from other racial and ethnic groups are attending.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my Colleagues to support this legislation. Historically Black Colleges and Universities not only are deserving of recognition, but they also are necessary to the vitality of our Nation's higher educational system. This legislation recognizes this very fact by acknowledging historically Black institutions' commitment to sustaining a viable education for students for over 100 years.

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DAN MILLER of Florida). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BOEHNER) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, H. Res. 523.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds of those present have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BOEHNER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

RECOGNIZING THE TEAMS AND PLAYERS OF THE NEGRO BASEBALL LEAGUES FOR THEIR CONTRIBUTIONS TO BASEBALL AND THE NATION

Mr. LATOURETTE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 337) recognizing the teams and players of the Negro Baseball Leagues for their achievements, dedication, sacrifices, and contributions to baseball and the Nation.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. CON. RES. 337

Whereas even though African-Americans were excluded from playing in the major leagues of baseball with their Caucasian counterparts, the desire of some African-Americans to play baseball could not be repressed;

Whereas African-Americans began organizing their own professional baseball teams in 1885;

Whereas 6 separate baseball leagues, known collectively as the Negro Baseball Leagues, were organized by African-Americans between 1920 and 1960;

Whereas the Negro Baseball Leagues included exceptionally talented players;

Whereas Jackie Robinson, whose career began in the Negro Baseball Leagues, was named Rookie of the Year in 1947 and subsequently led the Brooklyn Dodgers to 6 National League pennants and a World Series championship;

Whereas by achieving success on the baseball field, African-American baseball players helped break down color barriers and integrate African-Americans into all aspects of society in the United States;

Whereas during World War II, more than 50 Negro Baseball League players served in the Armed Forces of the United States;

Whereas during an era of sexism and gender barriers, 3 women played in the Negro Baseball Leagues;

Whereas the Negro Baseball Leagues helped teach the people of the United States that what matters most is not the color of a person's skin, but the content of that person's character and the measure of that person's skills and abilities;

Whereas only in recent years has the history of the Negro Baseball Leagues begun receiving the recognition that it deserves; and

Whereas baseball is the national pastime and reflects the history of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That Congress recognizes the teams and players of the Negro Baseball Leagues for their achievements, dedication, sacrifices, and contributions to baseball and the Nation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATOURETTE) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATOURETTE).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LATOURETTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Concurrent Resolution 337.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LATOURETTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, recognizes the teams and players of the Negro baseball leagues for their achievements, dedication, sacrifices and contributions to baseball and to the Nation. I want to commend the distinguished sponsors of this resolution, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS), for introducing this important resolution.

Until the mid-20th century when Jackie Robinson and Larry Doby, and parenthetically I would say Larry Doby of the Cleveland Indians, broke the color barrier, African Americans were excluded from playing major league baseball. Despite this, the desire that some African Americans had to play baseball professionally could not be repressed.

African Americans began organizing their own professional baseball teams. In 1885, the Cuban Giants from New York became the first professional African American baseball team.

□ 1100

In 1920, Rube Foster, known as the "Father of Negro Baseball," organized the Negro National League by adopting an organized league structure. Between 1920 and 1960, six separate baseball leagues known collectively as the Negro Baseball League were formed. The Negro Leagues maintained the high level of professional skill and, some believe, became centerpieces for economic development in many African American communities.

Teams such as the Pittsburgh Crawfords, which played in Pittsburgh's Hill District, reflected this high level of skill. The Crawfords won the 1935 Negro National League with future Hall of Famers James "Cool Papa" Bell, Oscar Charleston, Josh Gibson, Judy Johnson and the legendary Satchel Paige.

Again, Mr. Speaker, parenthetically, there is a book I had the pleasure of reading last year called Crooked River Burning, which, sadly, is about some of the sadder days in Cleveland, Ohio, but it is the story of a young Polish fellow who grew up on the west side of Cleveland and follows his life. But it begins in 1948 when he sneaks out of his uncle's house to go down to Municipal Stadium and sees the debut of Satchel Paige and the Cleveland Indians uniform, and over 70,000 people were in attendance on that evening.

Starting in 1935, the black teams began all-star game competition. The game was known as the East-West Game and was played each summer in Chicago's Comiskey Park. The Negro Leagues also had their own world series, but according to the Negro League Baseball Players Association, the East-West Game was considered more important than the world series and annually attracted between 20,000 and 50,000 fans.

In 1945, major league baseball started signing players from the Negro Baseball Leagues to its minor leagues for the first time since 1919. By 1950, five major league teams had black players; by 1953, seven clubs had 20 players; and by 1957, 14 clubs had 36 players.

As players in the Negro Baseball Leagues signed to play with the major leagues and attendance at Negro League games dropped, the Negro Baseball Leagues folded in 1960.

Events such as the 1991 opening of the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum in Kansas City, Missouri, reflect the recognition that the Negro Baseball Leagues and its players deserve. As this resolution notes, the Negro Baseball Leagues helped teach the country to judge others not by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character and the measure of their skills and abilities. In fact, Mr. Speaker, gender roles also fell in the Negro leagues, because three women played in them.

Mr. Speaker, I ask all Members of the House to support this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Government Reform, I am proud to be an original cosponsor of H. Con. Res. 337, recognizing the teams and players of the Negro Baseball Leagues. This is a measure that is long overdue.

Mr. Speaker, I have been an avid baseball fan since I was a young person, and actually 50 years after the fact I can still recite the starting lineup of the old Brooklyn Dodgers. So when my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS), approached me several months ago to cosponsor a resolution with him honoring the Negro Baseball Leagues and players, it was not exactly a hard sell. Likewise, I am sure, it was not difficult for the gentleman from New York (Mr. RANGEL) and Senators SANTORUM and MIKULSKI to join us.

I am reminded of Harlan Williams' observations in Jim Crow at Bat: Apartheid in Baseball, when he wrote that, "Baseball is America's game. It was invented here, flourished here, and has been exported all around the world. As a national phenomenon, baseball has long served to mirror cultural currents and national attitudes. And from its inception, baseball's racial attitudes have mirrored those of society."

In 1872, John "Bud" Fowler became the first African American to enter organized baseball. At the time, Sporting Life magazine called him "one of the best general players in the country. If he had had a white face," they said, "he would be playing with the best of them." He was joined by a handful of other black players.

However, by the end of the 1800s, the door to organized baseball was slammed shut to African Americans. We are here today to celebrate the response to this closed door.

In 1920, Andrew "Rube" Foster, the indisputable father of Negro baseball, convinced seven other team owners to join with his team, the Chicago American Giants, to form the Negro National League. In fact, in 1981, "Rube" Foster was inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, New York, where he is considered to be one of baseball's greatest renaissance men.

In the years following the establishment of the Negro National League, other Negro Baseball Leagues were formed. The skill of the play and the players was extraordinary, as was the colorful array of their nicknames: Satchel Paige, "Cool Papa" Bell, "Double-Duty" Radcliffe, "GroundHog" Thompson, and the list goes on and on.

Of the 254 members of the National Baseball Hall of Fame, 18 were players who had only played in the Negro leagues. Still others, including Willie Mays and Jackie Robinson, had first played in the Negro Leagues, then went on to play in the major leagues, and were later inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame. In fact, the caliber in the Negro Leagues was so high that many of the players who later moved on to the major leagues actually had better statistics playing there than they did in the Negro Leagues.

The electrifying decision by Branch Rickey to sign Jackie Robinson to play for the Brooklyn Dodgers in 1947 pushed open the closed door. As the best African American baseball players joined the major leagues, the Negro Baseball Leagues declined. The last teams folded in the early 1960s.

Some people shake their heads and say that the Negro League players came along too early. I think "Cool Papa" Bell had it right when he said "they opened the door too late."

But then it is never too late to right what has been wrong, to create equal opportunity and to open the doors for the Luke Easters, Minnie Minos, Kirby Puckett, Barry Bonds, Sammy Sosas, Frank Thomases and countless others who have thrilled and delighted us with their skill.

It is never too late to make America what it has never been, but must be. Opening the doors and recognizing the contributions that African Americans have made to baseball is a step in the right direction.

Thomas Wolf is reported to have said, "To every man his chance, his golden opportunity, to become whatever his talents, manhood and ambitions combine to make him. That is the promise of America."

This bill is a step in the right direction, I commend the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) for introducing it, and I urge its swift passage.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LATOURETTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS), the author of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. WATTS of Oklahoma. I thank the chairman for yielding me time, and I also want to commend and thank my friend from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS) for his assistance in this effort.

Mr. Speaker, when the National Association of Baseball Players on December 11, 1868, voted unanimously to bar "any club which may be comprised of one or more colored persons," a racial barrier was built, but an opportunity was born.

A few years later, the Cuban Giants in New York became the first black professional baseball team. The men in this fledgling organization played independently of any structured league, but started what would become a model for the first half of the 20th century.

There actually were some black players on integrated teams in the late 1800s. Brothers Moses Fleetwood Walker and Welday Walker played in the major leagues in 1884. But as a new century dawned, the systematic exclusion kept a lot of good talent off a lot of diamond-shaped fields.

In 1920, a man by the name of "Rube" Foster founded the eight-team Negro National League at a YMCA in Kansas City, Missouri. To this day, he is referred to as the Father of Black Baseball. Three years later, a pioneer named Ed Bolden formed the Eastern Colored League.

In 1933, echoing the major league structure, the Negro National League and the Negro American League were born. That same year, an all-star game was formed. Playing in Chicago's Comiskey Park, Negro League players garnered between 20,000 and 50,000 fans, who would come and watch the greatest black athletes of the day. Camden Yards, mind you, in Baltimore, holds less than 49,000 people.

Up until 1948, the Negro League World Series was played 11 times in all, surviving even the ruins of the Great Depression.

As we work to educate the public on the rich and awesome history of the Negro Leagues, we also must reflect on the progress that has been made in such a relatively short amount of time. Today we think nothing of seeing a black man at the plate hit home run after home run on teams like the Dodgers and the Yankees and the Giants and the Braves. It is difficult to realize that we would not see that same player a half century ago.

Jacques Barzun, a French American historian and former dean of Columbia University's graduate school, astutely observed in his book God's Country and Mine in 1994, "Whoever wants to know the heart and mind of America had better learn baseball."

Mr. Speaker, baseball is America. Along with apple pie and jazz and automobiles, it symbolizes who we are as a Nation. But let us not forget about who played in the shadow of the big leagues when our country subscribed to the ideology of separation.

I urge my colleagues to vote for this resolution to honor the players and the teams of the Negro Baseball Leagues.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, so I will simply close by indicating that it is a thrill and delight. There are still a number of ex-members of the Negro League who live around and in my congressional district, and three or four of them often convene at a McDonald's restaurant and sort of hold court. Individuals kind of move around and come by to chat with them and to see them. "Double-Duty" Radcliffe recently passed away.

But one of the teaching instruments that takes place as people realize who these men are and what their contributions have been, they stand there at "McDonald's University" and soak in all of the knowledge and information.

So, again, I want to commend my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS), for introducing H. Con. Res. 337, recognizing the teams and players of the Negro Leagues.

And as we recognize these teams and these players, I also want to acknowledge and recognize all of the parents and coaches who are involved in Little League baseball play. There is nothing better than watching a group of young people in organized Little League activity learning, growing, developing, reaching a level of understanding about teamwork, positive attitudes, and not on the corner hauling crack and blow, but listening to the sound of the crack of the bat.

So I commend the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) for this resolution, and I urge its passage.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LATOURETTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS) and the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. WATTS) for sponsoring this important resolution and working so hard to bring it to the floor.

This resolution pays tribute to the contributions of many fine athletes who did not get the recognition they deserved during their playing careers or, in many cases, during their lifetimes, because segregation required them to play out of the limelight.

Nevertheless, the players in the Negro Leagues were among some of the most accomplished who ever played our national pastime. Some went on to make their marks in the newly integrated major leagues. But all of them contributed to baseball history and helped pave the way for today's stars.

□ 1115

I urge passage of the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the players of the Negro Baseball Leagues. These brave Americans—barred from playing major league baseball—organized their own professional baseball leagues that were, by all accounts, the caliber and quality of the all-white league from which they were excluded.

What began in the early 1800's as informal contests became actual professional teams by 1885, and the official Negro Baseball Leagues by 1920. The leagues, which lasted until 1960 when African-American ballplayers were accepted into major league baseball, were the venue for some of the game's greatest players. Jackie Robinson, Satchel Paige, Willie Mays, and Hank Aaron were giants of the game of baseball—all got their start in the Negro Baseball Leagues.

More important than their impact on the game of baseball, however, was the symbolic value of the Negro Baseball Leagues. In an era where being black meant second-class status in America, the players of the Negro Baseball Leagues gave African-American children role models and helped to integrate the all-white American pastime.

Mr. Speaker, the struggle from segregation to full racial integration—a struggle that continues to this day—is the story of brave men and women who broke racial barriers by challenging the social, political, and economic norms of their time. The players of the Negro Baseball Leagues were such people.

Today, we commemorate the Negro Baseball Leagues and the indelible mark they made not only on baseball, but also on American society.

Mr. PUTNAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.C.R. 337 and particularly wish to recognize the Negro League teams that played in Florida and the players who now reside in our great State.

While there were other minor or semi-professional teams in our State, Florida's most recognized Negro League team was the Jacksonville Red Caps, who played in the Negro American League.

Their numbers are dwindling, there are now only 150 or so former Negro League players left in the entire country, so it is important that, as we consider H.C.R. 337, I also recognize former players of the Negro Leagues who now live in Florida.

While I'm sure my list of Florida's remaining Negro League players is not complete, each year the Jacksonville Suns honor former Negro League players, and on June 9 of this year they met at Wolfson Park and honored the following former Negro League players:

Herb Barnhill, who began his baseball career in 1936 and played for the Jacksonville Red Caps in 1938 and 1941–42;

Henry "Bird" Clark, who began his baseball career in 1955 at the age of 16 with the Kansas City Monarchs;

Art Hamilton, a catcher who started with the Indianapolis Clowns in 1953, played with the Detroit Stars and closed his career with the Philadelphia Phillies in 1961; and Harold "Buster" Hair Jr., who played for the Birmingham Black Barons in 1953, was drafted and played in Canada and then in 1958 played with the Kansas City Monarchs.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to join my colleagues today in recognizing the contributions of these African-American baseball players who now reside in Florida, and their surviving Negro League teammates. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LATOURETTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DAN MILLER of Florida). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATOURETTE) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution, H. Con. Res. 337.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds of those present have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. LATOURETTE. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

CONSUMER RENTAL PURCHASE AGREEMENT ACT

Mr. LINDER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 528 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 528

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 2(b) of rule XVIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill (H.R. 1701) to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to assure meaningful disclosures of the terms of rental-purchase agreements, including disclosures of all costs to consumers under such agreements, to provide certain substantive rights to consumers under such agreements, and for other purposes. The first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. General debate shall be confined to the bill and shall not exceed one hour, with 50 minutes equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Financial Services and 10 minutes equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary. After general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Financial Services, as amended by the amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, now printed in the bill. The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute shall be considered as read. No amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute shall be in order except those printed in the report of the Committee on Rules accompanying this resolution. Each such amendment may be offered only in the order printed in the report, may be offered only by a Member designated in the report, shall be considered as read, shall be debatable for the time specified in the report equally divided and controlled by the proponent and an opponent, shall not be subject to amendment, and shall not be subject to a demand for division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole. All points of order against such amendment are waived. At the conclusion of consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted. Any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LINDER) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. LINDER. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HASTINGS), pending which I yield myself such time as I might consume. During consideration of this resolution, all time yielded is for the purpose of debate only.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us is a fair, structured rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 1701, the Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement Act.

H. Res. 528 provides 1 hour of general debate, with 50 minutes equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Financial Services and 10 minutes equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The rule provides that the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Financial Services, as amended by the amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, now printed in the bill, shall be considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment and shall be considered as read.

H. Res. 528 makes in order only those amendments printed in the Committee on Rules report accompanying this resolution. It provides that the amendments printed in the report shall be considered only in the order printed in the report, may be offered only by a Member designated in the report, shall be considered as read, shall be debatable for the time specified in the report equally divided and controlled by the proponent and an opponent, shall not be subject to amendment, and shall not be subject to a demand for division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole. This rule waives all points of order against the amendments printed in the report.

Finally, H. Res. 528 provides for one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me in support of this fair rule, which would enable the House to work its will on H.R. 1701, and two separate amendments, one offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) and another offered by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS).

In summary, H.R. 1701 seeks to create uniform national disclosure standards for the rent-to-own industry. It provides greater cost information to consumers who are considering rental purchase agreements.

I would like to commend the work of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. OXLEY), my friend and colleague of the Committee on Financial Services, in bringing this legislation to the House floor, which I was pleased to cosponsor earlier this year. I also want to commend the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) for being the primary author of this measure.

Again, in closing, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this fair rule so that the House can proceed to consider the underlying legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HASTINGS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding the customary 30 minutes, and I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today in opposition to this rule and to the underlying bill, H.R. 1701, a bill to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to establish Federal disclosure requirements for rental purchase businesses.

Traditionally, rent-to-own businesses cater to low- and moderate-income individuals who either do not have the money or do not have the credit to purchase goods for their homes. These individuals turn to businesses such as Rent-A-Center or RentWay with the idea that renting is a reasonable alternative to purchasing their household goods; and although this may be true in some instances, that is not always the case.

Mr. Speaker, to quote the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS), who will speak on her own measures that she offered, one of which was accepted, three that were categorically rejected, she said this is special-interest legislation at its worst. For a number of reasons, this legislation fails to protect those consumers who depend on rental purchase businesses from being taken for a ride. And while the measure does implement necessary contracts, store tag, and advertising disclosure, it fails by preempting existing State consumer protection laws that treat rent-to-own transactions as credit sales and, therefore, require the disclosure of the cost of credit and annual percentage rates. A footnote right there, Mr. Speaker: in some of these failed disclosure situations, triple digit interest rates are being charged to people.

This bill might have had a chance of being a great piece of legislation, had the four amendments of my good friend and colleague, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS), and the second amendment of the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) been accepted; and I was in full and complete support of both being allowed. As a result, this legislation in my judgment is not worth the paper it is drafted on. It is not curative. When the question was put yesterday to the relevant subcommittee chairman, who I am sure will speak and thus speak passionately regarding this matter, when the question was put to him whether or not it was curative, he stated that it was "helpful."

Worse yet, the Committee on the Judiciary chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER), is quoted as saying, "The bill is unnecessary and unwise and is a misguided attempt to preempt the existing law of virtually every State."

The regulation of the rent-to-own industry is a State issue and all those who disagree, in my opinion, are misguided too.

How can H.R. 1701 fulfill its stated purpose to protect consumers against unfair rental purchase agreements and predator financial services if it does not require rent-to-own businesses to disclose the interest rates in the leasing contract? Would any of us accept a bank loan without the APR being stated in the contract?

Mr. Speaker, one of our duties as Members of Congress is to make accessible the highest quality of life for all those who live within our great country's borders. H.R. 1701 would work against that continuous goal, if passed as is; and I urge my colleagues to vote against H.R. 1701 and against this closed rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS).

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HASTINGS) for the attention that he paid to this particular piece of legislation in the Committee on Rules. I thank him for taking the time to understand it and to try and help me to make it a better bill with the amendments that I presented at the Committee on Rules.

I had four amendments in the Committee on Rules to H.R. 1701; only one was accepted and, of course, I thank the members for that. However, I think I was thrown a bone, a bone to say, well, we did something; but certainly, this does not cure what is wrong with this bill.

Let me tell my colleagues about the other amendments that I proposed that were not accepted. One of the amendments that I had was a very simple amendment. The sponsors of the bill had indicated that they wanted this bill to be a floor rather than a ceiling when it comes to State laws, and my amendment would simply strike a single subsection that would have accomplished that goal. Let me just share with my colleagues that 52 of the State Attorneys General earlier signed on to a letter objecting to this bill and, specifically, the preemption section. The Attorneys General stated: "Any State law that affords consumers the benefit of disclosures in rent-to-own agreements beyond those required by H.R. 1701 would be invalidated."

This is simply about State preemption. I am surprised that those who are advocating State preemption would do so when oftentimes we find they are standing up to protect States' rights and the State to protect its ability to make public policy in the interest of that State.

As initially considered in committee, the bill would have preempted all inconsistent Federal and State laws, regardless of whether they provided greater or less protection for consumers. This has been revised to preempt only those State laws or regulations that treat rent-to-own transactions as credit sales and apply credit-like regulation, including disclosure of annual percentage rates and cost limits based on APRs. This would provide for automatic preemption of the laws of four States: Wisconsin, New Jersey, Minnesota, and Vermont, which currently apply credit statutes and regulations to rent-to-own transactions. It would also preempt all States from imposing credit-like restrictions on rent-to-own transactions in the future.

A letter written to the Committee on Financial Services by 52 State and territorial Attorneys General expressed strong opposition to any language which "expressly preempts any State law that regulates a rent-to-own transaction as a credit sale or similar arrangement that requires the disclosure to consumers of an effective interest, annual percentage, or singular rate."

This is outrageous, and we should be ashamed that a bill like this could get this far in the Congress of the United States. Most of those people out there as consumers expect us to protect them. Why would we fight to keep this industry from disclosing the interest rates on rent-to-own contracts? I think I know why. Why would we not want to treat them like credit sales? I think I know why. But it is unconscionable and unreasonable that Members of the Congress of the United States of America would use their power to work against consumers in this way with an industry that has some really questionable practices.

Let me tell my colleagues about the third amendment that they rejected. It would have added a new subsection to prohibit any unfair or deceptive acts or practices and abusive collection by the rental purchase industry.

□ 1130

Mr. Speaker, for years the industry has resisted it being classified as a sale so that it would not be subject to protections governing credit sales transactions. At the same time, it has also resisted coming under protections offered by the Consumer Leasing Act. I think it is unconscionable that a Federal law purporting to regulate this industry would fail to include basic protections against unfair or deceptive practices.

Let me tell Members a little bit about this industry. Some of the more outrageous examples include rent-to-own employees struggling with the customer in the home over the possession of the television set, and picking up a nearby object and smashing the set. This happened in Maryland in 1983.

An employee was breaking and entering a customer's home, only to be shot and killed as a result, in Nebraska in 1980.

In a number of instances, rent-to-own dealers have been found liable for tort claims such as assault, battery, and trespass.

In 1985, a Texas jury returned a verdict of nearly $130,000 against a rental company for injuries to a customer which occurred during an attempted repossession.

Many rent-to-own dealers, when faced with an incident of wrongful repossession, will attempt to accuse the employee of unforeseen misconduct. It goes on and on and on, but my attempts to clean up the legislation were rejected.

Lastly, let me tell the Members about the fourth amendment, which was so reasonable. It would have placed a cap on total price.

Twelve States currently require an early purchase option in rent-to-own contracts: California, Connecticut, Delaware, Iowa, Maine, Michigan, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and West Virginia. All of these States employ a formula to determine how much equity is acquired in the product over time, and the difference between the figure and the cash price.

Six States impose substantive limits on rental purchase prices: Connecticut, Iowa, Michigan, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. My amendment is based on the New York law.

I would ask that we reject this rule because it has done nothing to make this a credible bill.

Mr. HASTINGS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I would like to add emphasis, in closing, to what the gentlewoman said. She had one amendment that brought to the attention of this body that when a person that is renting pays 133 percent of the total purchase price that they would own the property. Now, any of us that pay 133 percent of something ought to at least own 75 percent of something by the time that we do that. For us not to have made that amendment in order, in my judgment, is a mistake.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LINDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to point out that if one is buying a house, in the typical payment, one is paying roughly 200 percent of the cost of the house after it is over. Most people are not complaining.

And to the gentlewoman from California, who said twice she has a list of 52 attorneys general writing in against this, I would love to see that list.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DAN MILLER of Florida). The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HASTINGS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 238, nays 178, not voting 16, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DAN MILLER of Florida). Pursuant to House Resolution 528 and rule XVIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 1701.

□ 1222

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole

House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1701) to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to assure meaningful disclosures of the terms and rental-purchase agreements, including disclosures of all costs to consumers under such agreements, to provide certain substantive rights to consumers under such agreements, and for other purposes, with Mr. ISAKSON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the bill is considered as having been read the first time.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BACHUS) and the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) each will control 25 minutes for the Committee on Financial Services, and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER) and the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) each will control 5 minutes for the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BACHUS).

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to myself to speak in support of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I speak to the whole House when I say that the subject of the legislation we find ourselves debating on the floor here today is the rent-to-own industry and the need to have some floor of regulations over that industry.

There are 15 million citizens who annually use rent-to-own stores. There has been an exhaustive study, a survey of rent-to-own by the Federal Trade Commission. In fact, they made several suggestions and proposals. They outlined abuses in the industry.

Let me speak to that industry. That industry is an industry, like many others, that people, their only connection with it is they drive by a store, and we see more and more rent-to-own stores in their neighborhood or in their city, but they do not know much about it. What the survey found is that people of all educational levels apparently are using rent-to-own. The number of people that have graduate school degrees, a good percentage of those people are using these stores.

Sometimes people go in and they rent equipment, rent furniture for as little as a month or 2 months, or even 2 weeks. I recently talked to someone that said they had gone in a rent-to-own store, and their explanation was that they were going to be in a city for 2 months and they simply did not want to get a U-Haul. They checked on the U-Haul rate, and it was $900 out and $900 back, and so they made a decision to spend $1,500 on furniture.

Many Members, such as the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MALONEY), felt there ought to be some protection for consumers. There are State laws in 40 percent of the States that have protections; but this will establish in all 50 States a floor of protection. With the floor of protection we do not, and I want to repeat this, we do not preempt State consumer laws. We do not preempt State consumer laws. So there will be 15 States, if we enact this legislation, that will have stronger laws than this legislation. There will be approximately 35 that have weaker laws. In fact, there are States that have no laws. There are a number of States that have no laws. They will suddenly have laws regulating this industry. In fact, the worse abuses were in those States with no laws. The abuses identified in this report, they are addressed in this legislation. There will be significant provisions in this legislation to stop those abuses. There are States with very strong laws. We do not preempt those laws.

Do we preempt anything? Yes, we do. If we pass this law, there will be four States in which there is today an existing law, none which have been passed by the legislature, but four courts in four States have found that these are credit sales, and 46 States say they are leases. And those four States which say these are credit sales, we ought to give people disclosure like it was a credit sale, and we ought to show them the annual percentage rate.

Well, the IRS has looked at this and they say this is not a credit sale, this is a lease. This is not a credit sale. The Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Reserve, we brought them in. We had them testify. Is this a credit sale or is it a lease-purchase or a lease? They both said it is actually misleading and confusing to consumers to have them sign, have them give an APR disclosure of the annual percentage rate. It is a confusing thing. It will add nothing. That is what the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Reserve have said.

And I think legitimately there are Members among us, and they have every right to their opinion, saying that the law in these four States, we do not want to preempt the four States that have said it is a credit sale. Well, the alternative is not to strengthen the law in 36 States. That is the choice we have.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I would like the Members of this House of Representatives and the public to pay special attention to H.R. 1701, the bill we are debating on the floor today. For those Members who have been outraged about what they have learned about Enron and Global Crossing and Qwest and WorldCom and all of those major corporations which have been found to game the system, who have been ripping off the investors, who have been putting their pensioners at risk, if Members think that is bad, they ought to pay attention to this one.

□ 1230

This is special interest legislation at its worst, because the people who will be ripped off in these schemes are little people. They are poor people. They are working people. They are people without very much money.

We talk a lot about trying to do something about predatory lending. That is, some of us. But, Mr. Chairman, this rent-to-own industry falls in the category of the check cashers and the payday lenders and even the tax preparers that are ripping off the most vulnerable of our society.

Let me tell you more about this rent-to-own industry. The bill is falsely presented by its industry proponents as pro-consumer, as not preemptive of State law. That is absolutely not true. The bill has one purpose and one purpose only, to circumvent stronger consumer protections in the Federal Truth in Lending Act and in statutes of a handful of States that the rent-to-own industry had not been able to overturn.

As originally introduced, H.R. 1701 sought to preempt all inconsistent State laws. This included all current or future State laws that attempt to regulate rent-to-own transactions as credit or installment sales as well as industry-enacted State rent-to-own statutes that provide stronger, but inconsistent, protections for its consumers. Although the amended committee bill has narrowed the scope of the bill's preemption somewhat, the bill would still preempt the best of the State laws in New Jersey, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Vermont that seek to provide meaningful protections against unfair predatory practices; and it would still prevent these and other States from strengthening consumer protections in the future by treating rent-to-own transactions as credit sales.

If the industry had any good intentions, they would have supported my amendments in the Committee on Rules. I went in there and I asked for four simple amendments that I talked about during the debate on the rule. I suppose the worst of these is this preemption. Why would the Congress of the United States of America wish to preempt State laws that give strong protection to their people against this rip-off industry? The stories about what happens in this rent-to-own industry are absolutely outrageous and unconscionable. The idea that you could go in and rent a television that cost about $169, we checked this out, and end up paying $800 or $900 for that television set through one of these contracts, and on top of it, be forced to pay insurance that would protect the company from any damages that they may have caused in addition to what you may have caused is just simply outrageous.

Let me just say this. We are elected to come here to do a number of things. The least of that is to protect poor people and working people and voters and our constituents from being ripped off by industries that we know are ripping them off. We know what this is all about. Consumers must ask the question, Why would my Representative not protect me from this kind of rip-off? I want the consumers to ask that question.

Mr. Chairman, we have a lot of Members here, some Members here, who want to add their voices to try to protect consumers.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this bill. There is no overriding national need, no overriding public policy purpose, no overriding crisis that requires the Congress to federalize the regulation of the rent-to-own industry. The rent-to-own industry supports this legislation, and it is understandable why they do so. The fiscal note that is contained in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary says that the Federal Trade Commission intends to hire five new attorneys and investigators to investigate and enforce violations of this bill. That is five people nationwide looking into violations of the rent-to-own provisions that are contained in H.R. 1701.

That makes enforcement a joke. Because if you only have five cops regulating this pugnacious industry nationwide, you know that the law is not going to be enforced. So we are passing a piece of paper here supposedly in the name of consumer protection that the enforcing agency says that they will be able to enforce with just five people in the entire United States of America. I think that blows the cover on this being consumer protection legislation.

Let me tell you what this bill does to the Wisconsin Consumer Act. The Wisconsin Consumer Act by judicial construction has said that a rent-to-own contract is a credit transaction. This bill overrides that definition, and says it is a lease transaction and that eviscerates the enforcement by the Wisconsin attorney general's office of the rent-to-own industry. That is where the preemption is particularly harmful to consumers not only in my State but also in New Jersey, Minnesota, North Carolina, and Vermont.

Let us look at what enforcement has done in the States that have this preemption: $16 million worth of recoveries in Wisconsin, $30 million in Minnesota, and $60 million in New Jersey. So the rent-to-own industry knows that it is going to get a get-out-of-jail-free card should this legislation be passed. Furthermore, the Wisconsin legislature has been lobbied incessantly by this industry to pass an exemption, and they got it in as a budget amendment in this last budget cycle. Republican Governor Scott McCallum vetoed this exemption as being special interest legislation. So opposition to moving these transactions from credit to lease transactions in my State is bipartisan.

We have done a good job in regulating this industry in our State, and I think that has been the case in most of the other States. We should not do away with this. And if a State has lower consumer protections than this bill provides, then I think it is the business of that State legislature to look at their law and see if it is adequate and to make whatever amendments might be necessary. We should not have a Federal preemption even of a small amount in this legislation. I would urge the legislation to be defeated.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Let me simply respond to some of the arguments that we have heard here today and let me stress why I do not think those arguments have a lot of validity. They sound good. The gentleman from Wisconsin has said, "We don't think there's a national problem," but the gentlewoman from California stood up and talked about all sorts of abuses in all sorts of States. The Federal Trade Commission outlined abuses in several States. We have almost 20 States that have no regulation. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that this is up to the States, that the States ought to do something about this. When it came to homeowners, when it came to people that transact business with financial institutions, with Fair Debt Collection Practice Act, the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, Truth in Lending Act, Consumer Lease Act, Electronic Funds Transfer Act, we felt like the American consumer, the American customer, was entitled to some Federal protection. There is no Federal protection.

The gentleman did say that Wisconsin has acted, and acted in a tough way. Let me submit something to you. If we pass this legislation, there is nothing, nothing that prevents New Jersey, there is nothing that prevents Wisconsin, there is nothing that prevents Minnesota, there is nothing that prevents any of these States from banning these transactions. They can outlaw them. They can pass any type of tough legislation.

The gentlewoman from California is going to offer an amendment to basically put the California law as the law of all 50 States because she says California has this really tough provision and we want it in this bill. It will still be the law after we pass this legislation. It will still be the law in California. But to get enough support to pass this legislation, we have set a floor.

The gentlewoman from California talks about the attorney generals, that they wrote, all 50 of them, she said. But what you did not hear is that was to an original proposal before it came to the committee that I chair. When it came to the committee that I chair, we put in a provision that it does not preempt tougher consumer protection laws in those States that have it. In fact, my own attorney general who signed that letter wrote me September 13 and now says this legislation before us today will offer important new consumer protections for the citizens of my State. I do not have any protections now. The people of my State do not have any protections.

The gentlewoman from California, and I applaud her, and another gentlewoman from California and one of the gentlemen from Florida said, "In 40 States, you walk in these stores and there is not even a price tag on there. There is not even a disclosure as to the price." That is true. What did we do? We added a provision in this legislation that we are considering which, if it passes today, will require that in all 50 States, something that two of the States of the four that call this a credit sale do not even have today. And important, they said one of the most important protections a consumer ought to have. They will have that even in two of these States, including North Carolina.

Several things that North Carolina does not have if this law passes, they will have a much stronger law. Yes, we are overruling a judge in four States because we have to have a national standard. This does not work. You have to either call it a lease if you are going to have a Federal statute, or you have to call it a credit sale. Forty-six legislatures have said it is a credit sale. Those States, not legislatures, 46 States, including the majority of legislatures who have looked at it, well, all the legislatures that have looked at it say it is a lease. None of the legislatures have said it is a credit sale. Four judges sitting in four courts in four States have said it is a credit sale. The FTC, the Federal Reserve said this could be confusing. The IRS says it is not, that it is a lease. That is how we have come down. We have come down on the side of every legislature that has looked at this, the two Federal agencies that have looked at this, we have come down on that side. We have disagreed with four judges sitting in four courtrooms across the country because we have to come down on one side or the other because we strengthen the protections in 36 States, and we absolutely do not preempt any law that California has on the books today or other States, the 15 that have stronger laws except the credit sales thing.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE).

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I must come to the well of the House to oppose the bill that is before us today. Even if the amendments, the two amendments that have been permitted by the Committee on Rules, should pass, I would still have to vote against it as inadequate. I do this with some mixed emotions, however, because I believe it is very, very important for us to pass additional consumer protections for rent-to-own transactions. I do this not opposed to the concept of a rent-to-own transaction whatsoever. For certain individuals at certain times, they can be valuable. But before we pass a Federal law, it should meet a very solid standard. This bill simply does not do that.

We have a delicate balance that we have to reach whenever we pass Federal legislation given the dual sovereignty under which we exist. We have to have, it seems to me, minimal Federal standards, but permit States to be even more protective, not less, so that we could have competition for the best standard rather than a lowering of the standards.

This bill just does not do this.

Now, the gentleman from Alabama has said there are approximately 20 states that do not have any protections and that this bill would, therefore, be an improvement for them. I think the gentleman is right, and that is one side of the coin.

The other side of the coin, though, is that we do preempt things that the gentleman says we do not preempt, and we ought not to. The amendment that I proposed to the Committee on Rules which would deal with the preemption issue in a very good manner was simply not permitted by them, so we cannot bring it to the floor so we could have a debate on it. I think the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) will be offering a motion to recommit with her own preemption provision. It will differ a little from mine. We will see.

But who is for this bill and who is against it? First of all, it is called consumer rent-to-own. I think that is a misnomer, because no consumer groups support this bill. As a matter of fact, they all oppose it. The group Consumer Action opposes it, the Consumer Federation of America opposes it, Consumers League of New Jersey opposes it, the Consumers Union opposes it, the National Association of Consumer Advocates opposes it, the National Consumer Law Center opposes it, the U.S. Public Interest Research Group opposes it.

Who favors it? It is the rent-to-own industry, that has put the word "consumer" in the front of the bill. So I think this is a little bit deceptive in its marketing and its advertising.

Now, what about the attorneys general of the various States? I do know that the original bill as introduced was opposed by every single attorney general of every single State.

The bill has been amended and it has been improved, there is no question about that. But I know of no attorney general who has privately or publicly changed his or her opinion. Maybe you do. But all I do know is that at least with respect to the original bill, every single attorney general opposed it. So I think that is of some relevance, too, as we determine whether we want to pass a bill, especially if that bill will be preemptive.

Now, the question is, is the bill preemptive or not? You have differences of opinion, so let us go to the language of the bill. As I read it, it sounds pretty preemptive to me. On page 33, line 21, (b), "State laws relating to characterization of transaction. Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a), this title shall supersede any state law that, (1) regulates a rental purchase agreement as a security interest, credit sale, retail installment sale, conditional sale or any other form of consumer credit, or that imputes to a rental-purchase agreement the creation of a debt or extension of credit, or, (2) requires the disclosure of a percentage rate calculation, including a time-price differential, an annual percentage rate, or an effective annual percentage rate."

The States that have that will be superseded, and every single State in the Union will be precluded from doing that in the future. I say to the gentleman from Alabama, if that is not preemption, I do not know what it is.

Now, there are a lot of other difficulties, too, other than the issue of preemption. The issue of cash price is one of them. There have been studies done about the percentage of individuals who do not really rent, but ultimately wind up owning. The studies can be interpreted differently and they differ, but, suffice to say, a significant number do wind up owning it.

The fact of the matter is, if they were to go to some department store, they might be able to buy a TV set for $200, and, unfortunately, they wind up paying closer to $800 or $1,000 for it, and they think they are getting a good deal. They need to be protected. Some States attempt to protect them, and we would preclude that, and we certainly would apply that to all the States.

If we are going to have Federal legislation, we must deal with that cash-price issue. We must deal with what the total cost of ownership would be, because too many individuals across America are being taken to the cleaners right now.

We have an important business in our society, the rent-to-own business. It should exist and it can serve a valuable function for certain clients, but only if we legislate consumer protections. We probably could get there through a process of negotiation, but we have not as of today.

Mr. Chairman, I urge everyone to oppose final passage of this bill.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES), one of the sponsors of the legislation. North Carolina has been mentioned as one of the four States, and there are sponsors of this legislation from the State of North Carolina.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, since we have been talking about attorneys general around the United States, I must tell you one of my very best friends whom I served with for 10 years in the North Carolina House of Representatives is the Attorney General of North Carolina. His name is Roy Cooper. We have talked about a couple of other issues, but never did this come up. Maybe the other 49 are very concerned, but he has not shared that concern with me.

Let me tell just briefly the history of this issue as it relates to legislation dealing with the rent-to-own business. This goes back to a bill that was introduced 10 years ago by Congressman LoRocco from the West. That was 10 years ago, and, finally, after 10 years, right or wrong, we have brought this legislation to the floor. I certainly respect my friends on the other side of this issue, and I mean that most sincerely.

This consumer rent-to-own purchase agreement act, I do want to restate, represents the largest category of consumer transactions currently unregulated by the Federal Government. I mention that because we held hearings in the subcommittee of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BACHUS). I do not know if we had three or four, but I know there were several discussions. The gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) was very proactive. I disagree, but I respect her ability and her positions on this issue.

I think that the rent-to-own business, quite frankly, has wanted to work with the Congress on this legislation. Does it go far enough? Maybe not, but is it a step in the right direction? I think it is. Several comments have been made about the rent-to-own industry and just how bad some people think it is, and I would like to read just a couple of survey comments from the Federal Trade Commission, survey of rent-to-own customers, and this is April of 2000. I believe that the Clinton administration was the administration in the year 2000.

Let me read, in a couple of minutes, some of their surveys of those people who do rent the rent-to-own equipment. Sixty-seven percent of consumers intended to purchase the merchandise when they began the rent-to-own transaction, and 87 percent of the customers intending to purchase actually did purchase. So that sounds like to me a satisfied customer. I cannot imagine anyone not satisfied that would buy the product. Seventy-five percent of rent-to-own customers were satisfied with their experience with rent-to-own transactions. Seventy-five percent.

They also state that nearly half of all rent-to-own customers have been late making a payment. Sixty-four percent of late customers reported that the treatment they received from the store when they were late was either very good or good, and another percent, 20 percent, reported that the treatment was fair. So, Mr. Chairman, in that case 84 percent of the people that were late in their payments said that they had an experience with the business that was very positive.

I want to close with this minute by reading a letter from four of my colleagues from the Democratic side that I think would rate with anyone as being a friend of the consumer in this country. It is the gentleman from New York (Mr. TOWNS), the gentleman from New York (Mr. MEEKS), the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WYNN), the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. JEFFERSON) and the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CLYBURN). They sent a letter out on September 17. That is this week, obviously. I want to read, in closing, one paragraph:

"H.R. 1701 will help consumers in several ways. Most importantly, like the Truth in Lending Act and the Consumer Leasing Act, the bill improves disclosures so that consumers can understand the full costs of this transaction and make better decisions about spending their money. For example, about 30 states do not require any price tag disclosures of total costs, and H.R. 1701 will fix that. It prohibits mandatory purchase of insurance from merchants and other unfair charges. It forbids abusive collection practices. It provides moderate or substantial expansion of reinstatement rights in about 40 states. It authorizes enforcement by the FTC and State attorneys general."

And they close by saying this, the gentleman from New York (Mr. TOWNS), the gentleman from New York (Mr. MEEKS), the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. JEFFERSON), and the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CLYBURN) close this way, by saying to their colleagues, "We urge you to consider the merits of H.R. 1701 carefully, and we seek your support for its passage."

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Mrs. JONES).

Mrs. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman from California for yielding me this time.

I have prepared comments, but before I get to them let me say that it is really wonderful that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WYNN), the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. JEFFERSON), the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CLYBURN), and the gentleman from New York (Mr. MEEKS) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. TOWNS) would write a letter, but I am the gentlewoman from Ohio and there is the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) and the gentlewoman from California (Ms. LEE) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) and a number of great Members of this Congress who oppose this legislation.

Secondly, I do not care what a survey said about 67 percent intending to purchase or 87 percent did purchase. They are consumers, and as a Member of Congress, I am here to protect the consumers from the State of Ohio, California, New York, and anywhere else, and just because they responded to a survey as such does not mean they are being protected.

A few days ago, Mr. Chairman, I stopped by one of those fancy coffee shops that serve enough coffee variations for nearly everybody's peculiar tastes. Instead of going with my usual black with two sugars, I decided to be a bit more adventuresome and ordered a double-decaf-triple-blend-nondairy-double-latte-hazelnut-cappuccino. But when I got my customized drink, I had to sift through a thick layer of fluffy foam in order to get to a few sips of coffee that were actually in my cup. All in all, my coffee adventure was a big letdown, just like H.R. 1701 is also a letdown, and once you sift through the fluff, it is clear that this bill advances the interests of the rent-to-own industry while leaving its customer in a haze of disinformation.

The gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE), my esteemed colleagues, have offered several amendments that would address the abuses in what can rightfully be classified as legal loanshark rates. Without their amendments, the rent-to-own industry becomes a form of debt slavery where customers pay and pay and pay but in the end they may never get anything for their money.

We have heard the horror stories about the rent-to-own customers ultimately paying up to five times an item's actual cost before they can own it. Some in the industry have tried to skirt the issue of interest rates by claiming that these are not actually credit sales. But those claims conveniently ignore the ultimate goal of most rent-to-own customers, to own the product. The fundamental issue comes down to disclosure and H.R. 1701's advocates have tried to paint a picture of the excessive burdens that will come with disclosing some basic facts and answering simple questions about these transactions. But what is so burdensome about answering questions, as many of our amendments would do, such as what is the cash price if I buy today? Is that burdensome? Or what is my early purchase option? Or what is the effective interest rate if I make my weekly or monthly payment until I own the item? It is almost like those insurance policies that people of color used to buy in Alabama and they come by every day and pay 25 cents a week and month after month after month for 30 years and when they die they cannot even be put in the ground. What about what is the cost of any insurance of the services I pay? Or what about what are the guarantees in effect while I am still paying under a rent-to-own and after I purchase the item? Simple questions that we all want an answer to. The answers to these questions will allow customers to make better informed decisions when they are choosing between using a rent-to-own service or to buy an item outright. Where is the burden in that?

While I recognize the rent-to-own industry may serve a legitimate purpose by allowing customers to have an item for only short periods of time or consider alternatives when deciding whether to purchase, H.R. 1701 as it stands right now only serves to advance the special interests of many of the economic scavengers in the rent-to-own industry who are looking to have a feast on unwitting consumers.

I urge my colleagues to vote against this legislation.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from California (Ms. LEE).

Ms. LEE. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank my colleague, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS), for yielding me this time and also for her clarity in leading the charge against this special interest, anticonsumer legislation. Her hard work and clear understanding of this legislation has really brought focus to this debate and to this very deceitful bill. I also want to thank our ranking member on the committee, the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE), for his leadership and his dedication to really try to fix this very badly broken bill.

Now, when our committee considered this bill, I supported numerous amendments to improve it, but, of course, to no avail. Last night Members sought an opportunity to offer several meaningful amendments to the bill here today, but the Committee on Rules only allowed two. So what are we left with? A bad, broken bill that is in desperate need of repairs.

That is why I rise today in strong opposition to the underlying bill, the so-called rent-to-own bill, and in strong support of the Waters and LaFalce amendments. A more accurate name for the bill in its present state might be rent-at-your-own-risk or rent-until-you-could-have-owned-it-three-times-over, because this bill fails to provide real consumer protections against unscrupulous operators who charge exorbitant rates to low-income people for items really that a wealthy person could buy with their credit card for a mere fraction of the price.

Concerns over the business practices of the rent-to-own industry are very real. These merchants entice vulnerable low- and moderate-income consumers to acquire household goods with no credit checks, no qualification, and low payments, and disguise the true cost of the transaction.

Here are just a few of the enticements commonly used; we have no doubt heard them before: "Bad credit? No problem"; "Need a TV? Come on down"; "Get it today, enjoy it tonight"; "The sooner you come in, the more money you will save."

Well, perhaps on the other hand, if you do not live in a minority neighborhood, you may have never heard these ads.

These aggressive and alluring ads stress affordability and immediate rewards, only while completely ignoring the actual cost of acquiring the merchandise over the contract's term, which usually ends up being significantly higher than the cost of buying the merchandise through credit cards or more conventional means.

Though much of this bill merely duplicates existing weak rent-to-own laws in many States, it really has an insidious core. At the heart of this bill lies preemption language that would kill stronger State laws in four States, Minnesota, New Jersey, Wisconsin, and Vermont, that still treat rent-to-own as a credit transaction. So if this bill is enacted, all States would be required to treat rent-to-own sales as if they were leases subject to minimum disclosures, and the few remaining consumer protections in those four States would actually be lost.

No wonder this bill is opposed by all of the consumer groups, including Consumers Union, Consumers Federation of America, National Consumer Law Center, ACORN, U.S. PIRG, and others. No wonder all 52 State attorneys general oppose this bill.

Congress should really be working for true consumer protections for all Americans in rent-to-own transactions, not assaulting the laws of four States and creating a Federal ceiling on the regulation of the industry.

Frankly, this bill is simply another in the long line of well-titled, good-sounding, anti-consumer bills that the majority deems appropriate to spend our time discussing when the end of the fiscal year is right around the corner and the majority of this Chamber's work on appropriations has yet to be done.

So I urge all Members to stand up for consumers today by voting for the Waters and LaFalce amendments and oppose this sham industry bill.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, this legislation passed out of the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions and Consumer Credit, which I chair, on a vote of 24 to four.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MALONEY), my Democratic colleague on the full committee.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I rise to urge my colleagues to support the Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement Act, H.R. 1701. The bill before us is the product of many months of hard work by many Members. I especially want to thank the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) and my Committee on Financial Services colleagues on both sides of the aisle for their constructive input in producing a bipartisan, consumer-friendly piece of legislation.

Let me be clear. This bill establishes a Federal floor for rent-to-own disclosures and consumer rights, and preserves States' options to regulate costs and other disclosures. That is, States can still apply further economic and substantive safeguards such as regulating maximum rental costs, allowable fees, and fair collection practices, should they decide to do so.

In April of 2000, the Federal Trade Commission issued a staff report that addresses many of the issues surrounding the rent-to-own industry. Generally speaking, the FTC report concluded that clear and comprehensive disclosures of the rental-purchase transaction would benefit both the industry and consumers. That is what this bill does.

Additionally, the FTC made some recommendations regarding the types of disclosures that would benefit the consumer the Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement Act before us today begins to implement those recommendations. Let me quote or cite a few examples.

Again, H.R. 1701 establishes a Federal floor, assuring that more protective State laws continue in force and can be enacted in the future. Secondly, the bill expands and assures that the consumer's acquisition rights will be preserved after a missed payment if the consumer acts to reinstate the lease within a specified period of time. The bill prohibits mandatory charges for damage waiver. It requires price tags and labels and clarifies what should be included on those price tags and labels. It requires more accurate cost disclosures, and it requires the disclosure of whether or not the equipment is new or used.

The bill prohibits merchants from imposing a balloon payment or any other special fee to acquire ownership, and it prohibits abusive practices and provides stringent liability and enforcement mechanisms. The bill gives enforcement power to both the FTC and to the State attorneys general, and the bill ties criminal and civil liabilities and penalties for violations to the requirements for the Truth in Lending Act and the Consumer Leasing Act.

My good friends who oppose this legislation are simply wrong. This legislation creates a Federal floor. For all of the good things that they would like to achieve, in addition to what this bill does, can in fact be done at the State level; and I would submit to them that right now there is no Federal structure for the regulation of this industry. What this bill does is create the Federal structure for the regulation of this industry, for the benefit of the consumer, and creates an opportunity in the future to add additional protections as those protections are argued successfully through the congressional process. So this is a great opportunity for the consumer that we offer here today in this legislation.

Is this bill good for industry? Of course it is good for industry, because it creates that mandatory minimum Federal floor which helps create the national marketplace in which this activity can take place. That is the benefit of a continental market. But is it good for the consumer? Of course it is good for the consumer, because it establishes rights that consumers do not have now, takes no rights away, and gives the opportunity for additional rights, either to be granted by the States or to be granted by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, this is a very important step forward for consumers in this country, as well as a step forward for our economy.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to correct a few things. My colleague, the gentleman from Alabama, listed the FTC and cited the FTC report I think as support for the legislation. The FTC responded that they did not support a need for Federal legislation at this time. I just wanted to clear the record of that.

Also, I want to clear up some statements that were made by my colleague relative to preemption. We have a letter from the State of Wisconsin that says that this proposal would block all future State efforts to protect rent-to-own customers within the context of consumer credit regulation. They also go on to say that the substitute's approach to preemption is in conflict with the fundamental principle underlying the attorneys general letter of September 5, 2001.

So I do not want the Members of Congress to believe that somehow preemption is not a question. It certainly is still a question and, certainly, there is preemption.

Mr. Chairman, I want to share with my colleagues that some of the amendments that I attempted have been alluded to by other Members who have talked about this bill. I want to share with my colleagues that I tried to amend this legislation that would basically place a cap on total price. My amendment was based on New York and Iowa law which requires that a percentage of the periodic payment be devoted to equity. My amendment would have provided that 75 percent of each payment would count as an ownership interest in the property, and that the customer would acquire full ownership of the property when he or she had paid an amount equal to 133 percent of the cash price.

Well, that was opposed; and that is what some of my colleagues were talking about when they talked about the exorbitant prices.

Also, I would like to point out that I tried desperately to do something about the abusive practices with an amendment, and I cited some of the things that happened with these reposessions. Many of the rent-to-own contracts have clauses which attempt to sanction the entry into the customer's residence when the customer is not even at home. The contract currently used by a large company provides, and I quote, that "the lessor shall have the right forthwith and without prior notice to enter any premises where said property is located and take immediate possession of said property without the necessity of any legal or judicial process," and "the lessee shall be obligated to reimburse the lessor for any and all expenses related to any reasonable effort to repossess the property, including reasonable attorneys' fees."

This industry is unconscionable.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE).

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of difficulties with this bill. We could deal with those difficulties if we had more time and willingness, and if we were negotiating it, rather than an attempt to negotiate it with the industry. If we just proceed with this bill, I think it is dead for this Congress. I do not think it will see the light of day in the Senate.

What are some of the issues? Well, first of all, preemption is an issue. I read off the specific provisions of the bill that preclude preemption. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER), the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, wrote an excellent opinion explaining the difficulties he has because of preemption. These are not make-believe arguments; they are consumer protections that are preempted. States cannot do it. State laws are superseded. We need to deal with that issue.

Now, I actually do not think that those are the primary concerns of the rent-to-own industry. What are their primary concerns which probably only a handful of Members, at best, would even be aware of?

□ 1315

First, it is not so much the APR consumer protections, it is the treatment, the tax treatment of the rent-to-own contract. It is not that the IRS has said this is a lease to be written off for 3 years, it is that the rent-to-own industry got Congress to put a provision in the Tax Code that says a rent-to-own contract shall, by definition, be a lease, and shall be allowed a 3-year write-off. They are afraid that some provision of the Federal or State law might alter that treatment. We can deal with that.

They are also concerned, too, about if it is considered to be a credit sale, it might not be considered an asset of theirs. If it is not an asset of theirs, they might not have the security that is available to obtain cash flow financing from financial institutions. So that is another concern. I think that is something that could be dealt with, too.

In other words, we could deal with their business problems while still having good Federal standards for consumer protection and allowing the States to go further. This bill does not do it.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. KELLY).

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BACHUS) for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 1701. This is bipartisan legislation which would create a nationwide floor for rent-to-own contracts. In turn, this floor would create greater opportunities and flexibility for consumers to choose from when acquiring new products.

What kind of flexibility? Rent-to-own consumers do not need to commit to any specified amount of time to use these products. One example would be consumers who like to test out different products before deciding which product they will purchase. Rent-to-own gives them an opportunity to do that by just allowing the consumers to determine which of these products best suits their needs before purchasing that product.

In addition, rent-to-own allows consumers to obtain products they may only need for a short time. For instance, a consumer may want a giant screen TV for just the fall football season. They could engage in a rent-to-own contract for the fall, and at the end, simply return the TV, no questions asked, and end the agreement right on the spot.

Another example is particularly helpful for parents of children interested in taking music lessons on an instrument. These parents can obtain the instrument the child is interested in with a rent-to-own agreement. If the child loses interest, parents can simply return the instrument and stop making payments. Many school districts in the United States of America have this sort of thing in place.

Rent-to-own represents a viable and simple alternative for many Americans not looking to purchase a product. However, rent-to-own also represents an option for many Americans who lack credit or who do not have the funds to purchase a product they otherwise would be unable to obtain, so they do it slowly, with a rent-to-own contract.

In essence, this legislation is about ensuring greater options for consumers. As a body, I believe it is our mission to create more and not limit choices and opportunities for consumers.

Those opposed to this legislation claim the bill would override State law and harm consumers. That is a gross distortion. While this legislation would create a new floor for consumer protections in the States, in no way would the bill change any State law which is stronger than the standards written in the bill, nor would this bill prevent any State from enacting even stronger consumer protections for these leasehold agreements. What the bill does is create a floor of strong consumer protections from which States can work to help consumers who want to take advantage of rent-to-purchase opportunities.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join us in support for this legislation to give all consumers better protections in these contracts, and a lot more options in the market.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, what is behind this bill? Not a desire to create a Federal floor of consumer protections for rent-to-own customers, as the majority views allege. If Members really believe that the rent-to-own people are in here doing all of this fighting because they want to provide consumer protection for the people that they have been literally ripping off and abusing all of these years, then I guess I do have a bridge I want to sell them.

This is an effort to avoid hundreds of millions of dollars in legal penalties imposed by courts from precisely those States whose laws it would preempt. Since 1997, legal actions responding to State consumer law violations have produced legal judgments and settlements against the Nation's largest rent-to-own chain, Rent-a-Center, Incorporated, amounting to $30 million in Minnesota, $16 million in Wisconsin, and more than $60 million in New Jersey.

Unable to win under these State laws, or to overturn them at the State level, the rent-to-own industry is simply calling on Congress to preempt them. All of the national consumer organizations oppose H.R. 1701, as has been indicated, as an inadequate standard to protect vulnerable consumers from misleading lease arrangements that really mask installment sales at exorbitant rates of interest. That is what this is all about.

If Members travel through Washington, D.C. in the poorest areas, or any of these cities, Members will see the check cashing industry, the payday loan industry, the rent-to-own industry, where they put their operations, where people are the poorest and most vulnerable, people who are desperate, who do not ask the questions, and who are willing to do everything they can to make those weekly payments without asking, what is the bottom line? What do they add up to?

Mr. Chairman, we cannot allow the Congress of the United States to be used to shield these rip-off rent-to-own dealers. We cannot allow this industry, I do not care how powerful they think they are, how much money they think they have, to come in here and use the Congress of the United States to keep ripping off people who expect some protection from us.

If we cannot stop this legislation on the floor of Congress, we are not worth our salt. I would simply say to the Members of Congress, it is preemption, it is abusive, it is exorbitant. This is the worst of the worst.

Again, for all people who went home and said to their constituents, forgive me about Enron, I did not know any better; forgive me about WorldCom, I did not know any better; yes, I am going to be about corporate responsibility; no, I will not allow the rip-off of the citizens of the country anymore, what are they going to tell their consumers and their citizens and their constituents when they go home after they have voted for this?

We are not going to let Members forget it. This is an area that some of us are going to have to spend priority time on: predatory lending. Everybody that falls under that banner, they have had free rein in America for too long, and people are suffering from it.

The assets, the hopes, and aspirations are being drained out of poor communities. They will never catch up. They will never be able to have a savings account. They will never have money to pay down on a home because they have been ripped off, dribble by dribble, buck by buck.

I do not care whether it is Democrats or Republicans, this is not a bipartisan bill. Do not give me the name of any Democrats who support it, because they are just as bad as those on the opposite side of the aisle who support this. I do not care what color they are,

I do not care where they come from. As a matter of fact, I intend to expose every legislator, black, green, purple, I do not care what they are, that supports this kind of legislation. They have too much power. The people have invested too much in the Members of Congress for them to take their power and use it in this fashion. Not only is it unconscionable, but I daresay it is criminal to do so.

So they can name all the people who they want to name who supposedly support it, they can fashion their arguments in any way they want to call preemption, nonpreemption. They do not even try to defend against the abuses. They do not even try to defend against the exorbitant price because they cannot. It is just that bad.

Shame on us if we allow this legislation to get out of here. Shame on us who are elected by the people of this country, expecting us to give them some minimal protection. Many of them do not know about all of the fancy, highfalutin corporate relationships we have around here, but many of them do know that on a day-to-day basis they have to go to these little businesses because they think they have no place else to go to get a little help. They think we are looking out for them. I ask the Members of Congress to reject this legislation.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether I am sort of tan or yellow or whatever I am, but whatever I am, I want to agree with the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) about one thing. She has outlined a number of abuses. She has argued about a number of people that are being ripped off. I agree. But what she is saying has nothing to do with this bill, because this bill absolutely increases consumer protection.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. SANDLIN) to close, one of 24 Members of the Committee, after 4 days of hearings and markup, who voted overwhelmingly for this bill.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the House is finally considering this bipartisan legislation to establish Federal oversight of the rent-to-own industry. Contrary to what we have heard today, many of my poor constituents, my consumers, have absolutely no access to consumer products without the rent-to-own industry.

As we have all heard today, currently there is no Federal oversight or regulation of the rental purchase industry. The lack of a Federal consumer protection statute for this growing industry is inexcusable; it is unconscionable.

While H.R. 1701 may not be a perfect piece of legislation, it represents a vast improvement over the inadequate status quo that has been referred to today.

According to an April 2000 Federal Trade Commission staff report, the rent-to-own industry serves approximately 3 million Americans and generates nearly $4.5 billion in revenues. It is time for Congress to enact a Federal statute governing this growing industry that will subject rent-to-own merchants to Federal oversight and reasonable minimum standards for contracts and point-of-rental disclosures.

By establishing a Federal floor for rental purchase agreements, H.R. 1701 will strengthen consumer protections in 32 States, including the State that I am from in Texas.

At the same time, I have read this measure and this measure does not preempt State statutes that provide consumers with even tougher protections for consumers, including disclosures intended to give rental purchase consumers all the information necessary to make intelligent decisions. They can make those intelligent decisions, and they do have more protections. This is pro-consumer in Texas and across the country.

Ironically, the opponents of a uniform Federal standard for the rent-to-own industry, which would regulate the industry under the Truth in Lending Act, are usually the most forceful advocates of Federal protection for consumers. Far from being a weakening of consumer protections, as some opponents of this measure contend, H.R. 1701 merely codifies rulings by both the Federal Reserve Board and the Internal Revenue Service that treat rental purchase tax credits as lease sales.

This is pro-consumer, it is pro-protection. It increases the ability of consumers to have information to make intelligent decisions about the purchases they have, and it gives the poor, the disadvantaged, the unfortunate the opportunity to have access to consumer products that they could get absolutely no other way.

I urge my colleagues to pass this long overdue measure. Let us get some regulation in this industry. Let us help our consumers.

Mr. Chairman, as an original cosponsor of the Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement Act, I am glad that the House is finally considering this bipartisan legislation to establish federal oversight of the rent-to-own industry.

As we have all heard today currently there is no federal oversight or regulation of the rental purchase industry. The lack of a federal consumer protection statute for this growing industry is inexcusable, and while H.R. 1701 may not be a perfect piece of legislation, it represents a vast improvement over the inadequate status quo.

According to an April 2000 Federal Trade Commission staff report, the rent-to-own industry serves approximately 3 million Americans and generates nearly $4.5 billion in annual revenues.

In Texas alone, the rent-to-own industry generates nearly $500 million in annual revenues and employs 7,500 people. It is time for Congress to enact a federal statute governing this growing industry that will subject rent-to-own merchants to federal oversight and reasonable minimum standards for contract and point-of-rental disclosures.

By establishing a federal floor for rental purchase agreements, H.R. 1701 will strengthen consumer protections in 32 states, including Texas, that currently afford consumers weaker safeguards than those contained in the Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement Act. At the same time, this measure does not preempt state statutes that provide consumers with even tougher protections for consumers, including disclosures intended to give rental purchase customers all the information necessary to make intelligent decisions.

Ironically, opponents of a uniform, federal standard for the rent-to-own industry, which would regulate the industry under the Truth-in-Lending Act, are usually the most forceful advocates of federal protections for consumers. Far from being a radical weakening of consumer protections, as some opponents of this measure contend, H.R. 1701 merely codifies rulings by both the Federal Reserve Board and Internal Revenue Service that treat rental-purchase transactions as lease sales.

I urge my colleagues to pass this long-overdue measure on behalf of rental-purchase consumers across the country.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in opposition to H.R. 1701, the so-called Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement Act.

This bill has nothing to do with protecting consumers. It doesn't help the most financially vulnerable Americans that often rely on rent-to-own agreements just to afford some of the most basic necessities for their families.

This bill is more about letting the $5 billion dollar a year rent-to-own industry get out from under strict consumer protection standards in force in several states. This shouldn't come to anyone's surprise considering the Republican leadership's track record of giving corporate interests a free ride at the expense of America's working families.

Proponents of this bill are right in pointing out that rent-to-own agreements are not subject to any federal standard. But, their effort to create a new national standard is severely misguided. Not only does it overturn tougher consumer protection laws already in place in most states. But, it will also prevent some states from regulating these transactions altogether.

In addition, this bill doesn't include important disclosure requirements mandating that rent-to-own businesses inform consumers of the total cost of entering into these agreements. This undermines the basic principle of a free market by barring Americans from shopping competitively and making informed choices.

We should do more to demand accountability from the rent-to-own industry. This bill simply gives them a shelter to play games with financing gimmicks and impose hidden fees on vulnerable consumers.

I think Congress owes more to America's working families than to conspire in another corporate scam. I urge my colleagues to stand up for consumers and vote down this misguided bill.

Ms. SCHAKOWSKY. Mr. Chairman, today I rise in strong opposition to H.R. 1701. I urge my colleagues to join me in opposing this anti-consumer legislation. I want to thank Representative WATERS for her tireless work on behalf of consumers. Every national consumer rights organization and 52 state and extraterritorial Attorney Generals oppose this bill. I should also note that there is bipartisan opposition to this bill. The Judiciary Committee Chairman has stated that "H.R. 1701 is a misguided attempt to preempt the existing laws of virtually every state." I could not agree more.

This legislation sacrifices consumer protections for the sake of a politically connected industry that is notorious for exploiting consumers. We should not preempt strong consumer protection laws in Minnesota, New Jersey, Wisconsin, and Vermont. This bill would also effectively stop states from passing strong consumer protections in the future.

The $5 billion a year rent to own industry offers goods and services to people who do not have the credit or money to buy goods at the regular sales price. I should note that this industry that already receives special treatment by the IRS. The IRS grants the Rent to Own Industry a three-year depreciation schedule. The horse racing business is the only other industry that has a three-year depreciation schedule. This legislation will give this industry even more "special treatment."

H.R. 1701 effectively allows the rent to own industry to hide the true costs of its transactions by hiding interest rates. Consumers should know the final cost of a deal they have agreed to.

This industry provides goods to those who are unable to conventionally purchase goods. We in Congress should work to strengthen and not weaken protections for families that are struggling to make ends meet. Low-income people predominately use this market. It is estimated that over 30% receive some form of public assistance, 59% earn less than $25,000 and 73% have a high school degree or less. These consumers frequently end up paying 10 to 15 times of the rental price. On average it takes a consumer 77 weeks to own the good.

Consumers are deceived by low monthly installment rates. People should absolutely know what they are getting into when they agree to buy an item over a long period of time. This legislation will make it even harder for consumers to get fair and accurate information about their obligations. We in Congress should work to strengthen, not weaken protections for working families. This legislation will effectively increase low-income people's debt. Join me in voting against this anti-consumer legislation and voting for the motion to recommit that is being offered by the gentlelady from California.

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 1701, the Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement bill, rewrites every rent-to-own contract in the nation to conform to the dictates of federal politicians and bureaucrats. This bill thus represents another usurpation by Congress of powers reserved by the 9th and 10th amendments of the Constitution to the states and the people.

Rent-to-own transactions provide many low-income individuals an affordable means of obtaining durable goods, such as furniture, appliances and computers. Rent-to-own also provides a way of obtaining luxury items for a short time. For example, someone who cannot afford a big screen TV can use a rent-to-own contract to obtain such a TV to watch the Super Bowl.

Proponents of H.R. 1701 admit the benefits of rent-to-own but fret that rent-to-own transactions are regulated by the states, not the federal government. Proponents of this legislation claim that state regulations are inadequate, thus making federal regulations necessary. My well-intentioned colleagues ignore the fact that Congress has no legitimate authority to judge whether or not state regulations are adequate. This is because the Constitution gives the federal government no authority to regulate this type of transaction. Thus, whether or not state regulations are adequate is simply not for Congress to judge.

Some may claim that H.R. 1701 respects states' rights, because it does not preempt those state regulations acceptable to federal regulators. However, Mr. Chairman, this turns the constitutional meaning of federalism on its head. After all, the 10th amendment does not limit its protections to state laws approved of by the federal bureaucracy.

In addition to exceeding Congress's constitutional authority, H.R. 1701, like all federal regulatory schemes, could backfire and harm the very people it was intended to help. This is because any regulation inevitably raises the cost of doing business. These higher costs are passed along to the consumer in the form of either higher prices or fewer choices. The result of this is that marginal customers are priced out of the market. These consumers may prefer to sign contracts that do not meet federal standards as opposed to not having access to any rent-to-own contracts, but the Congress will deny them that option. According to the proponents of H.R. 1701, if people cannot obtain desired goods and services under terms satisfactory to the government, they are better off being denied those goods and services. Mr. Chairman, this type of "government knows best" legislation represents the worst type of paternalism and is totally inappropriate for a free society.

In conclusion, H.R. 1701 exceeds Congress's constitutional authority by regulating areas constitutionally left to the states. It also raises the cost of forming rent-to-own contracts and thus will deny those contracts to consumers who desire them. I therefore urge my colleagues to reject this paternalistic and unconstitutional bill.

Mr. SHOWS. Mr. Chairman, the rent-to-own industry provides an important service for those who cannot afford the initial expense of durable good purchases, such as furniture, washing machines, and televisions, and for those who are looking for temporary home furnishings. Many Mississippians rely on the convenience and accessibility of rent-to-own products. Nationally, rental and rent-to-own transactions total $5.3 billion each year. Because the rent-to-own industry provides such a vital service to so many people across the U.S., I am proud to support the Consumer Rental-Purchase Agreement Act on the floor of the House today.

The Consumer Rental-Purchase Agreement Act of 2002 (H.R. 1701) protects those consumers who opt to rent or rent-to-own. Because these types of transactions are short-term leases not covered by the Consumer Leasing Act or the Truth in Lending Act, H.R. 1701 fills a gap in federal regulation of consumer transactions.

H.R. 1701 regulates the rent-to-own industry by establishing federal regulatory framework for rent-to-own transactions. The legislation establishes a federal "floor" of minimum consumer protection for rent-to-own consumers in every state. This federal "floor" provides for consumer disclosures while still allowing states to impose price caps, fee limits, and other protections.

H.R. 1701 protects consumer rights. The bill extends the reinstatement period that preserves a consumer's acquisition rights after missing payments. It restricts the types of fees that merchants may charge, such as balloon payments for multiple late fees. The bill prevents merchants from requiring that customers purchase their damage waiver or insurance as a condition of the rental. It also prohibits abusive collection practices and protects customers from waiving their legal claims.

H.R. 1701 protects states' rights to regulate and establish business standards in the rent-to-own industry. The bill improves on the existing rent-to-own retail standards in more than 40 states but assures that more protective state laws continue in force. States can and do restrict rental costs and require further disclosures. H.R. 1701 also ensures the uniform definition of the transaction as a short-term lease with a purchase option (not an outright sale or secured transaction), consistent with current federal tax treatment and statutes in 46 states. The bill does not prevent states from imposing on rent-to-own transactions economic limits like those applied in state regulation of long-term leases or consumer credit.

The bill provides for more complete and accurate consumer disclosures, adopting several policy recommendations made by the Federal Trade Commission in a recent study of the industry. For example, H.R. 1701 requires that merchandise bear a price tag or label disclosing the "total cost" of the rental, including mandatory fees or charges, as well as the rental payment amount and number of payments to acquire ownership. Only 18 states currently require any type of price tag or label disclosure, and even fewer include all of the information mandated by H.R. 1701.

I am a proud cosponsor of this bipartisan legislation, which raises the standards of disclosure in the rent-to-own industry and ensures that consumers are protected during these transactions. As a member of the Committee on Financial Services, I voted in favor of this legislation on June 27th, which passed the committee with bipartisan support and was reported favorably to the full House, 29-9.

I am proud to support this bill on the floor of the House today because it guarantees that the relationship between rent-to-own retailers and consumers maintains its integrity and best serves each side's financial stake in rent or rent-to-own transactions.

Ms. JACKSON-LEE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, today I speak out in opposition to H.R. 1701. This bill does great harm to our nation's consumers while protecting the rent-to-own industry with weak regulations that are not suited to the true nature of the type of transaction these contracts really represent—credit-sales contracts.

Once again, we hasten to pass a bill that unfairly places the interests of common consumers below the interests of industry and business. Unfortunately, there are those in the rent-to-own business who create these contracts without providing full disclosure to the consumers who use them—consumers who ultimately intend to own the television, furniture or other good contemplated in the rent-to-own agreement. When these consumers fail to make payment, instead of giving them reasonable terms and conditions prolonging the contract, or reinstating the contract owners of these contracts often take possession of these goods—even after the consumers has made significant payments under the contract in excess of the actual cost of the goods.

The measure also raises another issue that Republicans often use as a battle cry when they support regulation that oppresses the rights of individuals or threatens what they term as undue burdens on business and industry. I cannot count the number of times that I have heard Republicans raise the issue of states rights arguing that states know best and decrying Federal encroachment upon state matters. However, when they want to elevate the rights of our nation's industries over the rights of individual consumers, states rights goes right out of the door. This measure tramples on the decisions of state regulators to regulate rent-to-own contracts as credit sales and turns federalism on its head. H.R. 1701 would preempt strong state laws regulating rent-to-own contracts from New Jersey, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Vermont. This measure preempts stronger state laws regulating rent-to-own contracts and is opposed by 52 state and territorial Attorneys General.

Consumer advocates oppose this measure. Furthermore, all of the government witnesses during the Judiciary Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative Law on this bill, including witnesses representing the Wisconsin Attorney General, the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Reserve declined to recommend action on H.R. 1701, further making the argument that this is nothing more than a giveaway to the industry. Yet, we still see this measure progressing in the House.

I do not believe at this juncture, in our nation's history, that this legislation reflects Congressional concern for a nation with a stagnant economy and teetering on the brink of war. At a time when all of our nation's citizens are particularly concerned for their well being we should not pass legislation that will allow industry to capitalize on those citizens with the most exposure to these turbulent times. For these reasons I do not support H.R. 1701, and if present, I would have voted "no."

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. HEFLEY). All time for general debate has expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Financial Services, amended by the amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, printed in the bill shall be considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule and shall be considered as read.

The text of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, is as follows:

H.R. 1701

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds as follows:
(1) The rental-purchase industry provides a service that meets and satisfies the demands of many consumers.

(2) Each year, approximately 2,300,000 United States households enter into rental-purchase transactions and over a 5-year period approximately 4,900,000 United States households will do so.

(3) Competition among the various firms engaged in the extension of rental-purchase transactions would be strengthened by informed use of rental-purchase transactions.

(4) The informed use of rental-purchase transactions results from an awareness of the cost thereof by consumers.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this title is to assure the availability of rental-purchase transactions and to assure simple, meaningful, and consistent disclosure of rental-purchase terms so that consumers will be able to more readily compare the available rental-purchase terms and avoid uninformed use of rental-purchase transactions, and to protect consumers against unfair rental-purchase practices.

“(3) provide that the consumer may terminate the agreement without paying any charges not previously due under the agreement by voluntarily surrendering or returning the property that is the subject of the agreement upon expiration of any rental period;

“(4) contain a provision for reinstatement of the agreement, which at a minimum—

“(A) permits a consumer who fails to make a timely rental payment to reinstate the agreement, without losing any rights or options which exist under the agreement, by the payment of all past due rental payments and any other charges then due under the agreement and a payment for the next rental period within 7 business days after failing to make a timely rental payment if the consumer pays more frequently than monthly;

“(B) if the consumer returns or voluntarily surrenders the property covered by the agreement, other than through judicial process, during the applicable reinstatement period set forth in subparagraph (A), permits the consumer to reinstate the agreement during a period of at least 60 days after the date of the return or surrender of the property by the payment of all amounts previously due under the agreement, any applicable fees, and a payment for the next rental period;

“(C) if the consumer has paid 50 percent or more of the total cost necessary to acquire ownership and returns or voluntarily surrenders the property, other than through judicial process, during the applicable reinstatement period set forth in subparagraph (A), permits the consumer to reinstate the agreement during a period of at least 120 days after the date of the return of the property by the payment of all amounts previously due under the agreement, any applicable fees, and a payment for the next rental period; and

“(D) permits the consumer, upon reinstatement of the agreement to receive the same property, if available, that was the subject of the rental-purchase agreement, or if the same property is not available, a substitute item of comparable quality and condition may be provided to the consumer; except that, the Board may, by regulation or order, exempt any independent small business (as defined by the Board by regulation) from the requirement of providing the same or comparable product during the extended reinstatement period provided in subparagraph (C), if the Board determines, taking into account such standards as the Board determines to be appropriate, that the reinstatement right provided in such subparagraph would provide excessive hardship for such independent small business.

“(5) provide a statement specifying the terms under which the consumer shall acquire ownership of the property that is the subject of the rental-purchase agreement either by payment of the total cost to acquire ownership, as provided in section 1006, or by exercise of any early purchase option provided in the rental-purchase agreement;

“(6) provide a statement disclosing that if any part of a manufacturer’s express warranty covers the property at the time the consumer acquires ownership of the property, the warranty will be transferred to the consumer if allowed by the terms of the warranty; and

“(7) provide, to the extent applicable, a description of any grace period for making any periodic payment, the amount of any security deposit, if any, to be paid by the consumer upon initiation of the rental-purchase agreement, and the terms for refund of such security deposit to the consumer upon return, surrender or purchase of the property.

“(b) REPOSSESSION DURING REINSTATEMENT PERIOD.—Subsection (a)(4) shall not be construed so as to prevent a merchant from attempting to repossess property during the reinstatement period pursuant to subsection (a)(4)(A), but such a repossession does not affect the consumer’s right to reinstate.

“SEC. 1006. RIGHT TO ACQUIRE OWNERSHIP.

“(a) IN GENERAL.—The consumer shall acquire ownership of the property that is the subject of the rental-purchase agreement, and the rental-purchase agreement shall terminate, upon compliance by the consumer with the requirements of subsection (b) or any early payment option provided in the rental purchase agreement, and upon payment of any past due payments and fees, as permitted in regulation by the Board.

“(b) PAYMENT OF TOTAL COST.—The consumer shall acquire ownership of the rental property upon payment of the total cost of the rental-purchase agreement, as such term is defined in section 1001(17), and as disclosed to the consumer in the rental-purchase agreement pursuant to section 1004(a).

“(c) ADDITIONAL FEES PROHIBITED.—A merchant shall not require the consumer to pay, as a condition for acquiring ownership of the property that is the subject of the rental-purchase agreement, any fee or charge in addition to, or in excess of, the regular periodic payments required by subsection (b), or any early purchase option amount provided in the rental-purchase agreement, as applicable. A requirement that the consumer pay an unpaid late charge or other fee or charge which the merchant has previously billed to the consumer shall not constitute an additional fee or charge for purposes of this subsection.

“(4) The substitution of property with property that has a substantially equivalent or greater economic value provided the rental-purchase cost does not increase.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 528, the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) and a Member opposed each shall control 10 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE).

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

□ 1330

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, before I get to the specifics of the amendment before us, let me just make a couple of points.

Some individuals have said there is no Federal protection; therefore, we need something to protect consumers. Let me underscore again the fact that every single consumer organization that I am aware of opposes this bill, and they are very pro-consumer. These organizations such as Consumers Union, the Consumers Federation of America, et cetera, they are pretty pro-consumer and they are adamantly opposed to this bill. So when individuals come to the floor and say that this is a consumer bill, there is a disconnect. And I ask people to draw their own conclusions as to what the cause of the disconnect is.

Secondly, some individuals keep getting up here and saying there is no preemption whatsoever; the States can do anything they want to. Again, I ask them to go to page 32 of the bill and 33, lines 20 through 7 on page 33 where it specifically says that notwithstanding the provisions of the rest of the bill, this title shall supersede any State law that does the following, and then it ticks it off including the disclosure of a percentage rate calculation, including a time-price differential, an annual percentage rate, an effective annual percentage rate, that, if a State law calls for it, eliminates a State law. If a State wants to pass legislation, it is precluded.

Do not come to this floor with a straight face and say that the States can do anything they want when this language is in here. If you come to the floor, read this language.

Unfortunately, the Committee on Rules is not offering us the opportunity to correct those deficiencies with an appropriate amendment. That means whatever happens with respect to the amendment the bill is still going to be defective.

They have permitted me to deal with one issue and that is the issue of cash price. And this is a rather large issue. It is going to be a controversial one, I understand that. But such a significant percentage of consumers who rent do wind up owning, that we have to ask what is the price of their ownership, and are they aware of it, and should we permit the rental industry to charge such an enormous price to the consumers, most of whom are the poorest in our society?

First of all, let us ask, well, what does it usually cost to own something? There have been a few studies. First of all, let me quote to you from a document put out by the U.S. PIRG, the Public Interest Research Group. They did a study, the average outright cash price for a 19-inch color TV at a department store would be $217; at a rent-to-own, $415. The average cost to rent to own a 19-inch color TV, that is outright; but the average cost at the department store $217. At the rent-to-own, $746. That is the total average cost, $746 as opposed to $217 at a department store. And I could go on and on and on.

More recently, a study was done by a professor at the Rochester Institute of Technology, Professor Robert Manning. He wrote the book "Credit Card Nation." He has a chapter in that book dealing with the rent-to-own industry. He says that the total Circuit City credit cost for a 19-inch Magnavox television was $231, whereas, the total cost under the rental purchase contract was $779. Unbelievable.

For a $190 Fisher 4-head VCR, the total retail credit cost at Circuit City would be $236.22 versus a total cost of $935.33 at Rent-a-Center.

This is unconscionable. Almost everybody who winds up owning property, and that is a significant number, and the gentleman himself has used figures of around 70 or 80 percent. I am not sure exactly what the accurate percentage is but it is significant, are winding up paying three, four, five times the cost of what it would be someplace else. I think we need to deal with that.

At present there are at least 12 States that currently impose some form of restriction on the cost consumers must pay to acquire ownership of rent-to-own merchandise. Over half these State impose limits on total rental costs and fees, while others provide an early purchase option that permits consumers who have access to cash to reduce the overall cost of the transaction.

But by far the simplest approach I have found for limiting total ownership cost under rent-to-own arrangements is that included in the New York State law as well as in the rent-to-own statutes of Ohio and Nebraska. Under this approach, a consumer is assured of acquiring ownership of the rental property whenever their total rental payments reach an amount that is equal to two times or twice the stated cash price of the property. Now, this can be accomplished by making all scheduled payments or by a lump sum early-purchase option payment. This approach helps to limit the costs consumers must pay to own a product while also assuring a reasonable return for the merchants of roughly twice the retail cost.

Now, unfortunately, even this approach has run into problems in my own State of New York as rent-to-own merchants have sought to inflate the cash price of products in order to increase the total purchase price. So a product might be $200 at a department store, they call the cash price $400; and, therefore, they are able to charge $800 rather than the $200. So despite the intent of the law to have the cash price reflect local retail prices, rent-to-own merchants have often set the cash price at a much higher level than they would charge consumers to purchase the product outright.

Inflating the cash prices serves two purposes for rent-to-own merchants. It inflates the total cost consumers will ultimately pay to acquire ownership of the rental property, and it discourages consumers from making outright purchases of merchandise and encourages longer term, more costly rentals.

My amendment would make the ownership cost limitation in New York and Ohio State law presently the minimum standard of protection in the bill. Consumers who have made rental payments equal to twice the cash price of the rental property would be entitled to full ownership of the property. But in order to make this work as a national standard, the amendment would also direct the Federal Reserve Board, who would be responsible for the totality of this legislation, to issue regulations providing detailed criteria or a formula calculating the cash price for rental property together with additional criteria for adjusting the cash price for previously used property.

The Federal Reserve Board has acted in other circumstances to promulgate regulations dealing with truth and lending, et cetera, so I think they certainly would be able to do this.

Now, let me first say that with respect to preemption, this bill would not preempt the State laws dealing with cash price. I will get that out front. Nor would it preclude the States on their own from adopting some cash price restrictions in the future.

The difficulty is there is no good cash price law right now because of the ability of the rent-to-own industry to determine what cash price is and the trend is going in the other direction. If we are going to pass Federal legislation, we ought to get it right. We ought to protect the consumer. And it seems to me that the only bargaining power we are going to have is now. Once you pass any Federal legislation, I think it will be impossible as a political matter to strengthen it. There will be so much opposition. And so, if we are going to protect the consumer, we cannot do it later. It has got to be done as a condition of the passage of this particular bill. Otherwise, in my judgment, politically you will forfeit the opportunity to get it right in the future. And that is why this amendment, if we are going to go forward, ought to be included in the bill.

In its original form, H.R. 1701 provided no substantive equity or ownership protections for consumers. It provided no legal assurance that upon making all required rental payments a consumer will actually acquire ownership of the rented property. It offered no assurance that the consumer will not have to pay additional fees or meet additional conditions to acquire ownership. And it provided no assurance that, even after making all payments, the consumer will be given the appropriate documentation of ownership and any applicable warranties for the property.

Fortunately, I was able to offer several amendments that corrected these problems with the bill. However, equally serious problems were not resolved in fact that the bill does nothing to limit the outrageous costs that many consumers must pay over time to acquire ownership of merchandise under rent-to-own arrangements.

These costs can be substantial, and are often obscured from consumers by promotions that highlight only the low, and seemingly affordable weekly rental rate, while hiding total cost figures in confusing small print.

At least twelve states currently impose some form of restriction on the cost consumers must pay to acquire ownership of rent-to-own merchandise. Over half these states impose limits on total rental costs and fees, while others provide an early purchase option that permits consumers who have access to cash to reduce the overall cost of the transaction.

By far the simplest approach I have found for limiting total ownership costs under rent-to-own arrangements is that included in New York State law, as well as in the rent-to-own statutes of Ohio and Nebraska. Under this approach, a consumer is assured of acquiring ownership of the rental property whenever their total rental payments reach an amount that is equal to two times, or twice, the stated cash price of the property.

This can be accomplished by making all scheduled payments or by a lump sum early purchase option payment. This approach helps to limit the costs consumers must pay to own a product, while also assuring a reasonable return for the merchant of roughly twice the retail cost.

Unfortunately, this approach has run into problems in New York as rent-to-own merchants have sought to inflate the cash price of products in order to increase the total purchase price. Despite the intent of the law to have the cash price reflect local retail prices, rent-to-own merchants often set the cash price at a much higher level than they would charge consumers to purchase the product outright.

Inflating the cash prices serves two purposes for rent-to-own merchants—it inflates the total cost consumers will ultimately pay to acquire ownership of the rented property, and it discourages consumers from making outright purchases of merchandise and encourages longer term, more costly, rentals.

My amendment would make the ownership cost limitation in New York and Ohio State law the minimum standard of protection in the bill. Consumers who have made rental payments equal to twice the cash price of the rental property would be entitled to full ownership of the property.

To make this work as a national standard, the amendment also directs the Federal Reserve Board to issue regulations providing detailed criteria or a formula calculating the cash price for rental property, together with additional criteria for adjusting the cash price for previously used property. The Board would, in effect, provide a basis for determining cash price for rental-purchase transactions in much the same way it established a framework for determining annual percentage rates (APR) calculations for credit transactions thirty years ago.

Under the amendment, the calculation provided by the Board would assure a cash price at least to two times the merchant's acquisition cost, plus any supplemental costs the Board considers appropriate. The cash price would be set more uniformly at or near comparable retail prices for consumers in all parts of the country. And it would assure a total return for the merchants at somewhere near four times acquisition costs—a rate of return that most retail merchants would envy.

I would emphasize again that this is only the minimum standard for protecting consumers from excessive ownership costs. All states would continue to have the option of providing additional cost protections for consumers within their state.

We've made considerable progress in the bill in a pro-consumer direction. My amendment takes it a step further by assuring that the total cost of acquiring ownership of rent-to-own merchandise is reasonable for both the consumer and the merchant.

My amendment is entirely consistent with what proponents describe as the purpose of the bill. It takes the best approach currently in State law, sets it as the minimum federal protection, and continues to permit states to add whatever additional protections they consider necessary to adequately protect consumers.

I think this is a reasonable and balanced approach and I would urge its adoption.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment, and I think the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) was accurate in basically much of what he said, and what he said was, I believe that we ought to have a price control; we ought to have price restriction. And 12 States do have that in their State legislation. And after we pass this legislation today, if the State chooses to pass it, those price restrictions will still be in place. There is no preemption.

As I have said repeatedly on the floor of this House in this debate here today, the only thing, the only thing that is preempted is the decision by four judges in four States, three or four States, there is a question in one of the States, whether to call this credit sales. And we have come down on the side of what the great body of evidence, all the State legislatures who have considered this as for tax treatment, IRS, how they have treated it, as a lease. And as I said, we have to make that decision if we are to have Federal regulation. We have done that.

And in those four States, there are three States, they are absolutely right, if this is an important protection for consumers in this State then that is taken away. However, I will tell you that in Wisconsin because of legislation, all the rent-to-own stores are closing or have closed so they are not giving anybody in Wisconsin that approach, did not give them any choice. It basically drove the industry out.

I applaud the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) for her honesty. She has said, I do not like this industry. I do not want them in business. And she has been upfront about that. As far as the consumer groups that we keep hearing about, when this legislation was introduced, they came to the Hill en masse and they said, We like some of what is in here, but I will tell you what we do not like, we do not like preempting those States with stronger laws and we are not going to support legislation until that is done.

Now, I would not have co-sponsored the bill. I did not introduce the bill. It came to my committee and at that time before 4 or 5 days of hearing, that is what they came to me and said. They said, Absolutely we will not support it unless that is in it. Put that in it and we will talk to you.

We had Members on both sides that did not like the fact that we preempted certain protections in certain States. So we have backed up, and we did not preempt any of those consumer protection laws. They are not preempted.

The attorney general of Alabama in a letter that he wrote me this week said, "If enacted, the legislation employed would set the floor for consumer protection while leaving intact existing State regulations that offer greater protection to consumers; and going forward under this legislation, any State legislature that chooses to do so can enact additional protection for its citizens that go beyond what is included in H.R. 1701."

Now, that is absolutely a fact. I do not think there is any argument there. I applaud the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS). I applaud the other gentlewoman from California in that they have been opposed to this legislation and that they will be opposed to this legislation from now on. They want these stores closed. And there may be other Members of the body that want that.

There may be others that want price restrictions. Twelve States have opted for it. I really do not understand this. I do not understand how 38 States have said we do not want price restrictions. Yet the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE), who said, We are preempting what four States have done, now gets up with an amendment that changes the law in 38 States. Where is the consistency there?

□ 1345

When this proposal came up we went to the Federal Reserve. The gentleman from New York has said the Federal Reserve will set these cash prices formulas. Can my colleagues imagine when the Federal Reserve heard about an amendment that the Federal Reserve would have to start taking all their time and going around and setting these maximum prices? Do I need to inform this body they are opposed to having to do this? Absolutely they are opposed to it.

As the FTC concluded in its report, and I have it on page 98, we talked about all these exorbitant and excessive profits. The FTC looked at that, page 98, and what they said is they said there are almost no barriers to entering this business. They said a person can get a store front, a delivery truck and an inventory of household merchandise, and they can enter the industry. They said because there are no barriers to entering this industry, if people are making a big profit, somebody else will come in down the street and open up, and they said that excessive profits can be maintained only if there are significant barriers to entering, to collusion, or some type of anti-competitive barrier. There do not appear to be any significant barriers to entry that would prevent new firms from entering the rent-to-own industry. That is what they concluded.

They said no evidence that excessive profits, and they said, therefore, and the issue here was price restrictions, until it is shown that there are some barriers to introduction in this industry or some States erect barriers to people getting into the industry, and I know of none, that price restrictions that are contemplated, they should be explored more fully but they should not be enacted.

Another thing, the consumer groups, and my colleagues know these same consumer groups, it is interesting, if we look back at some of the important legislation that this Congress has passed, legislation including the Consumer Leasing Act, Fair Debt Collection Act, Fair Reporting Act, these consumer groups, it never was good enough for them. They always opposed them. They always wanted a little more. They push for it but they wanted something else and they urge, and they will continue even though we have 46 States, we do nothing about strong protection, we increase protection. We increase protections in all 50 States. As I said, some of the four States that call this a credit sale do not require people to put a price tag on there. We require that.

One of the consumer groups said the terrible abuse, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) pointed this out, to her credit, was that these people go in and they do not know what they are paying for this. There are 40 States throughout who do not require any disclosure today at where the item is as to the price they are paying, 40

States, including some that set the price.

This legislation requires point-of-rental disclosures as to price, something that the consumer groups say is badly needed. This legislation does it. They oppose it.

They say they want preemption because 12 States have gone beyond what we establish. They do not want us to interfere with those 12 States. So we did not. They are still opposed to it and they will be opposed to it ad infinitum, and that is okay. That is their right, but the one thing that we do not need in this body is we do not need to misrepresent this thing as a bill that does not increase consumer protection because it absolutely does. In 46 States it absolutely does, and four where they have the credit sales thing, one can argue that that effectively keeps people from going to rent-to-own stores. So in those four States, it might aid the industry, but in the other States it will not because it establishes new requirements, and because I am one of those 46 States I will be on the floor voting for this.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. HEFLEY). All time for debate has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE).

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 6 of rule XVIII, further proceedings on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) will be postponed.

It is now in order to consider Amendment No. 2 printed in House Report 107-661.

AMENDMENT NO. 2 OFFERED BY MS. WATERS

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the amendment.

The text of the amendment is as follows:

Amendment No. 2 offered by Ms. WATERS:

Page 19, line 22, strike “‘A rental-purchase agreement’” and insert “‘(a) IN GENERAL.—A rental-purchase agreement’”.

“(b) CONTINUED APPLICABILITY OF EXISTING LAW.—

“(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), the risk of any loss, damage, or destruction of the property that is the subject of a rental-purchase agreement shall remain with the merchant throughout the period such agreement is in effect and any rental-purchase agreement, or any waiver or other form of agreement between the merchant and the consumer, that purports to shift the burden of any such risk, and the cost of insuring against any such risk, to the consumer shall be null and void.

“(2) EXCEPTION FOR LOSS, DAMAGE, OR DESTRUCTION FOR WHICH THE CONSUMER IS DI-

RECTLY RESPONSIBLE.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to any loss, damage, or destruction that was deliberately caused by the consumer or that occurred due to the negligence of the consumer.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 528, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) and the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BACHUS) each will control 10 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS).

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I would first like to start this presentation by thanking the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER) who was on the floor today to help oppose this legislation. As my colleagues know, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER) and I do not always get along on all of the issues that come before us, but he is a man of impeccable integrity, and I would like to thank him for taking the floor today in opposition to the legislation that is before us.

Also, before I get into the debate on this amendment, I would like to thank my colleague from Alabama, and while I have been very, very pointed in my discussion about this, I do respect him. I have worked with him on debt relief. I have worked with him, along with many of the church organizations of the world, to do something about debt relief for poor countries. Today, I would ask him to do some domestic debt relief and work with me to make sure that we relieve the poor citizens of this Nation from the awful burden of debt that has been placed on them by these rip-off industries, and certainly the rent-to-own falls within that category.

Let me say this. I had four amendments before the Committee on Rules. I was denied three of them, but as I said earlier, I was thrown a bone and allowed to present this one amendment. As unbelievable as it is, given everything that we have learned about the rent-to-own industry, the preemption, the abusive practices, all of that, let me add one more to the list of unbelievable practices.

Under the common law of bailment, a merchant is responsible for damage to property unless the customer is neglectful or fails to exercise ordinary care. Typically, rental-purchase agreements contractually shift all responsibility for damages to the customer in a rent-to-own business. The merchant sells a liability damage waiver to the customer which effectively makes customers pay for responsibility that is not theirs. This amendment would ban this shifting of the liability to the consumer and prohibits the charging of a fee for ensuring the customer against loss. There is an exception for loss, damage or destruction that is deliberately caused by the consumer that is a result of consumer negligence.

Imagine this. A person has got this contract with the rent-to-own industry. They need this television or whatever it is, refrigerator, whatever. Not only do they have an arrangement that is not considered a credit sales contract arrangement and so they do not have to disclose anything, they do not have to disclose what the interest is on it, and this industry just can charge whatever they want to charge that person. Then they say to the person, now, they are responsible for this item and we have a little something that is built into this contract that we want the person to pay. We want the person to pay some amount. What amount? Any amount that they decide. In some States the amount that they charge the customer is equal to the amount that they are paying weekly to rent this particular item, but they can do this, and they do not have to disclose it.

It was so bad that in committee, what they decided is, say, well, at least they have to tell the consumer that they are going to charge them this damage waiver liability coverage in the contract. In my home State of California, we forbid this practice altogether. We forbid it altogether. It is wrong that they should shift this liability all to the consumer and the rent-to-own company takes no responsibility, charges whatever it wants, does not have to disclose it, and we just let this practice go on.

So we would try with this amendment to stop the practice altogether. I know that it seems that we cannot say much more about the bad practices. Why would we preempt the States from taking the opportunity to fix what is wrong? We do not need to come over the top with some Federal legislation that would then preempt them from doing it the way they want to do it.

This business about saying that we are helping the States and we are helping the consumer, we are not preempting them, is absolutely misleading the Members of Congress about what this is all about. If we really want to help the States, allow them to present public policy that will work in their States. For those States that do not have it, they will. Give them a chance. Do not preempt them. Do not create this so-called floor that my colleagues are talking about.

I have never seen any one industry with so much that is wrong with it, and I sincerely believe that some of my colleagues who are trying to help the industry may have been duped. They did not know it was this bad. They did not understand that it really was preemption. They did not know about some of these abusive practices. They did not know about this, what do we call it, LDW. They did not know that people were being given contracts where they had to pay for this kind of coverage, and most people, even if we tell them, if they want it, we are going to charge a person whatever amount they decide to charge them as a fee just in case they damage this equipment, they do not know they could say no, even if we put it in the bill. They just assume that if they do not do it they will not be able to get this desperately needed item that they are going after.

This amendment was made by the Committee on Rules. I could come to the floor and take it up. I do not know if my friends on the opposite side of the aisle are going to oppose it or if they are going to support it. It is just one other thing that I would like to point out that is so bad about this industry, as we wrap up today on this floor, all of the problems with rent-to-own.

I hope that they would just show a sign of support for the consumers and say we will give my colleagues this one, but it does not make any difference. It is still a bad bill. It is still a terrible bill with all of the preemption in it, with all of the abusive practices allowed, all of which we have talked about so much today.

Again, I would again thank my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER), the chair of the Committee on the Judiciary. He would not come to this floor and oppose this legislation unless it was serious. He would not come to this floor and easily embrace those on the opposite side of the aisle that he is oftentimes in disagreement with unless he felt very strongly about it. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER) does not simply oppose his colleagues. He does not do that without giving serious thought to it. When he came here today and said this is a bad bill, something is wrong with this bill, I would hope that the Members on the opposite side of the aisle would respect the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary who, too, had this bill in the Committee on the Judiciary.

We are talking about two committees here today, the Committee on Financial Services, and it was in the Committee on the Judiciary.

□ 1400

This is not something that he is speculating about from afar. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER) had this in committee and had an opportunity to go through it, understands it very well and is opposed to it because the gentleman sees it for what it is.

Again, I do not want to put my colleagues on the spot, and I have the highest respect for the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BACHUS). I have worked with the gentleman and I know in many instances he has had to work very hard to do the right thing on some issues. I would simply appeal to the gentleman to do the right thing. I do not care who in the leadership is pushing this bill. I do not care who the industry is friends with, what letters the Congress of the United States got from what sector or section. The fact of the matter is our constituents should be premier. They should be number one. Even if we were going to err, we need to err on the side of the constituents. If Members think for a moment there are bad things in this industry, as the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BACHUS) has said, and yes, there are some bad things. He agreed to that, but then err on the side of the constituents. My colleague from Alabama said I do not like this business. That is an understatement. I am not here simply because I do not like the business. I am here because I have the power as one Member of Congress to go on the floor of Congress and say what is wrong with them. They are ripping off our constituents. They are charging exorbitant prices. There is no disclosure, and we should not let them do it.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. KELLY).

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, before I address the Waters amendment, let me say a few things about the LaFalce amendment.

The LaFalce amendment runs counter to our economy and would subvert the free market. The amendment requires rent-to-own merchants all to offer the same cash price for their products, and these prices would be set by the Federal Reserve Board. I have to wonder why we have to impose such a duty on the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve is tasked with broad mandates to ensure the overall health of the economy through sound monetary policy. The last thing we need is for the Federal Reserve to become an appraiser and set prices for the rent-to-own industry.

Second, the amendment would harm competition in the rent-to-own industry. I do not see anyone advocating that a car lease would have a cash price set by the Federal Reserve. Why? Because we know that a competitive car lease market benefits the consumer. When an industry all has the same base price for a product, that is known as collusion. A merchant not fairly setting a price on their own but being required to set it at their competition's level, that is illegal. When airlines set their ticket prices, it is illegal. When they put such a practice into law on a rent-to-own lease, it is also wrong. I think that my colleagues should join me in support of the free market and oppose the LaFalce amendment.

Mr. Chairman, now let me speak to the Waters amendment, which I also oppose. My colleague from California has here an amendment that would remove the responsibility of a consumer to care for the merchandise that they received through a rental purchase agreement. The agreement would effectively preempt contract law that is already in place and established in 49 States. In effect the merchant, who is not in possession of the property, would be responsible for the damage to it. This amendment would take away any responsibility for the consumer to care for the product that they are renting. Does anyone know of any agreement in which the holder of a rental piece of property would not be responsible for the damage that they do to it while it is in their possession?

I believe the amendment would effectively kill the industry; and in these slow economic times, I do not think we should be looking to eliminate more jobs. The rental purchase industry is a credible option for many Americans who would not otherwise have the opportunity to obtain the products that they need.

Personally, I learned to play the violin on a rent-to-own violin. It provided an enormous amount of joy in my life because my folks could not afford to buy me a violin when I was in grade school. They did a rent-to-purchase agreement. There are kids all over the Nation who do this.

Our mission in Congress should be to increase opportunities for people, not to limit consumer opportunities. Let me be clear on another point. Because of an amendment from the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES), the bill allows merchants to include liability damage waivers as part of the rental purchase contracts only after disclosing to the consumer that they need not purchase this coverage in order to enter into the rental purchase agreement itself. The bill is clear that the consumer has been given the choice, and we need to support the choice by voting against the Waters amendment.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, one thing I would like to point out, I have great respect for the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER), who did speak against this legislation. I would point out to the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) that what the gentleman said was we do not need any Federal legislation regulating this industry. That is not what the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) has said or what the gentleman from New York said, or what all of these consumer groups have said.

What they have said is we need to regulate this industry. There is certainly not disagreement among the opponents. I think some of the opponents want the present state of affairs where there is absolutely no regulation in a number of States to continue. There are others that want to put this industry out of business, and then there are those of us in the middle who believe this is a legitimate business. We may never go there as customers. There are a lot of stores I do not go in as a customer, but I do not try to close them down because 15 million Americans do go there. There are Members of this body who think if they do that they are crazy and we ought to protect them by stopping them from going in those stores.

I would say to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) that I went in a store in Manhattan a few weeks ago. There were a lot of things in that store I cannot afford. I simply turned around and walked out because the price was not right. There are people that might want to pay that. There were many people paying that much for those items. I could not do it. I made a decision. People are free to come in and leave. People are free to make choices in America.

There does need to be some minimum protection for those customers. Whether this legislation passed or not, people are going to continue to go in rent-to-own stores. They are going to continue to operate in almost all our States. When they do, I think they ought to be protected. And this legislation does not preempt any of the strong consumer protection laws that exist. It preempts none of them except the characterization as a credit sale, and we have been over and over that in those four States. It does that.

Now, let me talk about the amendment for a minute because this amendment is another example of we do not want to preempt, but here is an amendment that we want to use to preempt. It is a preempting agreement. It preempts the law of 49 States.

What the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) has offered here is an amendment that would overturn the long-established contract law in 49 States and make the law of California the national standard. It would apply the law of California.

Right now in the legislation we have, what she is advocating is the law of California and once this passes, if it passes, will continue to be the law in California. But we will not put that law on the other 49 States because what California does, it says when there is a rent-to-own agreement or a rent-to-purchase agreement, or the consumer leases something, they cannot shift the liability for that property onto the customer except, and there is an exception, and I do not want to misrepresent this, it says if the customer deliberately causes damage to the item or it occurs due to the consumer's negligence, then the merchant can get his money back.

The gentlewoman and I agree on that. If somebody goes out and they rent a TV, they get home and they get mad at their wife and throw the TV at their wife or husband, they have to pay for the television. She and I agree that is the thing to do. But we do not agree if the husband or the wife rents the TV, the wife takes the TV home, the husband picks up the TV and throws it out the window, then I think the merchant ought not have to pay for that. She says no, no. That was not the customer, that was the husband of the customer.

I believe when something is rented and taken home, if the next door neighbor comes in and they destroy it, or the renter's son or daughter destroys it, the renter has it and it is destroyed, I think the renter ought to be responsible for that, and 49 States say they ought to be responsible for that.

I can tell Members, we all respect California and their position on this; but this is something California feels ought to be the law. I can tell Members in Alabama, if I rent something to somebody and their dog chews it up or their wife breaks it or their next door neighbor destroys it, or even somebody comes in and steals it from them, I do not feel like that is the merchant's responsibility. I feel it is the customer's responsibility. I happen to believe that.

The legislatures and the courts of 49 States agree with me. California is different. This legislation says that is right. The law of California stays in place because we do not preempt any of those laws. Now what that does is that means it drives up the cost for everybody in California. If California wants to make that decision, that is fine. I do not agree.

I want to close simply by thanking the gentleman from Ohio (Chairman OXLEY) for his leadership on this bill, again thanking the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) for his leadership, and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MALONEY) for what I think is a very important piece of consumer protection. It does not go as far as some have urged, but it does not preempt States that go further. It establishes a floor in those States that have weak or no protection.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. HEFLEY). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 6 of rule XVIII, further proceedings on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) will be postponed.

SEQUENTIAL VOTES POSTPONED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 6 of rule XVIII, proceedings will now resume on those amendments on which further proceedings were postponed in the following order: amendment No. 1 offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr.

LAFALCE), amendment No. 2 offered by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS).

The Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for the second electronic vote.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE CHAIRMAN PRO TEMPORE

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. HEFLEY). Pursuant to clause 6 of rule XVIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device will be taken on the second amendment.

AMENDMENT NO. 2 OFFERED BY MS. WATERS

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The pending business is the demand for a recorded vote on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) on which further proceedings were postponed and on which the noes prevailed by voice vote.

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Stated against:

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, on rollcall No. 393, I was unavoidably detained. Had I been present, I would have voted "no."

Mr. MCHUGH. Mr. Chairman, on rollcall No. 393, I inadvertently voted "aye." I would like the RECORD to show that I meant to vote "no."

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. HEFLEY). There being no further amendment in order, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD) having assumed the chair, Mr. HEFLEY, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1701) to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to assure meaningful disclosures of the terms of rental-purchase agreements, including disclosures of all costs to consumers under such agreements, to provide certain substantive rights to consumers under such agreements, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 528, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MS. WATERS

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentlewoman opposed to the bill?

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, yes, I am opposed to the bill in its current form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ms. WATERS moves that the bill H.R. 1701, the Consumer Rental Purchase Agreement Act, be recommitted to the Committee on Financial Services with instructions that the Committee report the bill forthwith to the House with the following amendment:

Page 32, strike line 17 and insert "This".

Page 33, line 13, strike "Except as provided in subsection (b), for" and insert "For".

Page 33, strike line 21 and all that follows through page 34, line 9 (and redesignate the subsequent subsection accordingly).

Ms. WATERS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from California?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) is recognized for 5 minutes on her motion to recommit.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I suppose most of the Members present here today heard the debate that we have just finished on H.R. 1701. My motion to recommit sends H.R. 1701 back to the Committee on Financial Services with instructions to amend the bill in one key respect: to strike a provision in H.R. 1701 that preempts the States from applying credit or installment sales standards to regulate rent-to-own transactions.

This is the provision that my colleagues heard the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER) come to the floor and talk about today. It is because of that provision that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary decided to vote against the bill when this bill was marked up in the Committee on the Judiciary. I think that is a very important point.

Mr. Speaker, I suppose most of the Members on the floor heard the debate. We talked about a lot of things that are wrong with the rent-to-own legislation, H.R. 1701. We spoke about preemption, abusive practices, about attempts to force the consumers to accept all of the liability on the contracts. But we talked mostly about preemption.

Proponents of H.R. 1701 say that the bill does not preempt State laws, but they are absolutely wrong. Section 1018 of the bill expressly supersedes State laws that regulate rental purchase agreements as a security interest, credit sale, retail installment sale, conditional sale, or any and all other forms of consumer credit that treats a rental purchase agreement as the creation of a debt or extension of credit. Section 1008 of the bill also expressly supersedes State laws that require the disclosure of percentage rate calculation, including a time-price differential and annual percentage rate, or an effective annual percentage rate. Because of the bill's restrictions, rental-purchase transactions cannot be subjected to the State usury laws and finance charge limits, as well as APR and other disclosures. As a result, the bill preempts the strongest State laws in Wisconsin, Minnesota, New Jersey, and Vermont and prevents other States from adopting similar legislation in the future.

Since 1997, legal actions responding to State consumer law violations have produced legal judgments or settlements against the Nation's largest rent-to-own chain amounting to $16 million in Wisconsin, $60 million in New Jersey, and $30 million in Minnesota. Why should Congress cancel out stronger State laws supported by all of the consumer groups and literally all of the States' attorneys general? Consumers need more, not less, protection from predatory financial practices.

Mr. Speaker, the Members may not be paying attention, but they ought to. They ought to pay attention because we have just been roundly criticized because of what we did not do with major corporations in America. Many people pleaded ignorance that they had supported the efforts of Enron and WorldCom and Quest and all of those other major corporations that have been found to be gaming the system, corporations that put their pensioners at risk. People who were paying into their 401(k)s thought they had protected their future; but, in fact, they had been supporting their companies while the heads of those corporations, the majors in those corporations were literally exercising their stock options and getting richer and richer.

Well, we can tell the American people that we really did not understand, that we really were not paying attention; but we cannot keep doing it. We cannot keep saying, oh, I made a mistake.

Right on the heels of this great debacle in America, we find ourselves confronted with predatory lenders that come in all stripes and sizes. We know that the pay-day lenders are on every corner in inner cities and little towns and now lined up outside of our American Army bases where they are luring people in to get these small loans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman's time has expired.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully request that I be allowed the time that has been interfered with by the Members on the floor who have not respected the Speaker's gavel. The Speaker has taken up at least a minute of my time, and I would like to have it restored to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) is recognized for 30 additional seconds to conclude her remarks.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, the rent-to-own industry has come to this House, and they have gotten support to try and preempt States that have stronger consumer protection laws. We should not allow it to happen. It is unconscionable that we are allowing them to rip off the most vulnerable in our society with these rent-to-own contracts that are charging $800 and $900 for a $169 television, and on and on it goes.

□ 1500

We have the opportunity to do something about it today. I would ask that we allow this bill to be recommitted so that it can be fixed.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek time in opposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). The gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BACHUS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BACHUS. Mr. Speaker, the body has just heard a lot of information. It was probably about equally divided between information that is not relevant to the legislation before us and misinformation about the legislation. It is very hard in 5 minutes to rebut all of that.

First, let me say that this has nothing to do with WorldCom, Enron, and Quest. Those companies are not in the rent-to-own industry, so any confusion, I hope we dispel that right up front.

What the gentlewoman is talking about is the rent-to-own industry. It is the largest industry in America that is not regulated. The States are pretty much divided: One-third of them have no regulation, one-third of them have weak-to-moderate regulation, and one third of them have strong regulation.

What this legislation does, it leaves in place all consumer protection legislation at the State level, all. It leaves all those laws passed by the State legislature, all, and I will explain that, all of them in place. It simply has a floor. It requires certain things. If the State has a stronger provision, that is applicable. If the State has a weaker provision, the Federal standard applies.

Today, over 40 States do not require that they put a price tag on a rent-to-own item. Every consumer group has condemned this. This legislation will require a price tag so the consumer knows what he is paying, what it is costing him.

In every State, in 46 States, the legislatures have looked at these transactions and they have said that it is not a consumer credit sale. It is not a credit sale, it is a lease or a lease-purchase or a rent-to-own. It is not a credit sale.

But judges in three courts around the country have said, no, it is a credit sale. It is a consumer credit transaction, and we are going to apply all the Federal law that applies to those transactions to this. We are going to apply all the Federal laws that apply to those transactions, including an APR statement, a disclosure statement.

The FTC, in a fairly exhaustive study, looked at that, and the Federal Reserve and the FTC said that requiring these APR statements and these consumer disclosures which are required for credit sales, when we apply them to rent-to-own, we confuse or mislead the customer. California does not do it, New York does not do it; but judges, not State legislatures, judges in three or four States have said we are going to do that.

This legislation does change the law in Wisconsin, New Jersey, and one other State, Vermont. It changes it in those three States by saying that it is not a credit sale. It does not repeal any law that the legislatures passed. It does invalidate a judge-made law in those States. But in no case, in no case other than in those four States, three or four States, does it make any change in the law.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, and I have said that repeatedly during this debate, there is nothing in this legislation that prevents a State from passing any law that they want to pass to ban or put additional restrictions on these sales, except to mischaracterize it as a consumer credit transaction. These people are going in and they are renting property, that is what they say, and they do not think they are applying for a loan. Those regulations should not apply to them.

The gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) has asked us to really apply the law of four States to the law of 46 States. I say, resist this motion to recommit and let us get on with protecting the people, the 15 million Americans that use these rent-to-own transactions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 9 of rule XX, the Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the minimum time for any electronic vote on the question of passage.

This will be a 15-minute vote followed by a 5-minute vote.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 190, noes 227, not voting 15, as follows:

MOTION TO INSTRUCT CONFEREES ON H.R. 3295, HELP AMERICA VOTE ACT OF 2001

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to instruct the conferees on the Help America Vote Act, H.R. 3295.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ms. WATERS moves that the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate amendments to the bill H.R. 3295 be instructed to take such actions as may be appropriate to ensure that a conference report is filed on the bill prior to October 1, 2002.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS).

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

This motion instructs the conferees on H.R. 3295, the election reform legislation, to complete their work and file a conference report prior to October 31, 2002. Mr. Speaker, it has been almost 2 years since the 2000 Presidential election, an election that created a crisis of confidence in our Nation's election system. It has been more than 9 months since the House of Representatives passed the Help America Vote Act, H.R. 3295. It has been more than 5 months since the Senate passed its version of election reform legislation, S. 565, the Martin Luther King, Jr. Equal Protection of Voting Rights Act of 2002 by a vote of 99 to 1. Yet the conferees still have not completed their work.

The 2000 Presidential election lost between 500,000 and 1.2 million votes because of faulty machines, confusing ballot designations and designs, reported voter intimidation, and other human and mechanical impediments to the voting process. According to the United States census population survey, 2.8 percent of the 40 million voters who did not vote in 2000 stated they did not vote because of problems with polling place operations such as long lines and inconvenient hours or locations. Many of those who did vote in 2000 found themselves wondering whether their vote was counted and whether they actually voted for the candidate of their choice. We have already begun to observe similar problems in the 2002 primary election in several States, not to mention Florida one more time.

Mr. Speaker, in February of 2001, because of all of this, House Democratic leader Richard Gephardt asked me to lead the Democratic Caucus Special Committee on Election Reform. The committee was given the responsibility to travel throughout America and examine our Nation's voting practices and equipment. Over a 6-month period of time, this committee held six public-filled hearings in Philadelphia, San Antonio, Chicago, Jacksonville, Cleveland, and Los Angeles. We heard from election experts and hundreds of voters about what is wrong with our election system. I was overwhelmed by the outpouring of interest and support we received from our Nation's voters.

Our committee released a comprehensive report on November 7, 2001, the anniversary of the 2000 election debacle. The committee's report, entitled Revitalizing our Nation's Election System, set forth targeted minimal standards for Federal elections in order to guarantee that every vote will count. This report became part of the foundation for H.R. 3295, the Help America Vote Act of 2001.

Mr. Speaker, not only did Leader GEPHARDT appoint me to lead the Democratic Caucus Special Committee on Election Reform, many other committees around this country were working to try to find out what went wrong, what is wrong with our election system, what is it we have not paid attention to, what caused us to get to the point of such dysfunction in that election. The NAACP held hearings. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights held hearings. There was a Carter-Ford Commission, and then, of course, this legislation was taken up that I am referring to by the Committee on House Administration led by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY). And, of course, even though the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS) is not here today, our ranking member on the Committee of the Judiciary has spent countless hours meeting with human rights groups and civil rights groups not only here in the Capitol but across the country, and I am told by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS) that wherever he travels, he is asked what is going to be done about election reform? What are you going to do to correct the problems in the election system?

In addition to that, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and many others that I am unable to notice today have already been holding hearings, gathering information and trying to bring us to a point of reform.

With that, let me just say that the Help America Vote Act would establish the election assistance commission, set up a program to buy out or improve antiquated punch card voting systems, authorize funds to improve the administration of elections, improve procedures for uniform and overseas voters, and set certain minimal standards for State and local election systems.

The Help America Vote Act was passed again by the House of Representatives on December 12, 2001, by an overwhelming vote of 362 to 63. You can see, Mr. Speaker, it is time for us to do something. It is time for the conferees to act. We need to get this conference report done and reported out.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. NEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I rise in support of the gentlewoman from California's (Ms. WATERS) motion to instruct, the one offered by the distinguished Member. I want to thank her for offering the motion.

I believe that the conferees, Mr. Speaker, on the election reform bill are within sight of an agreement that will bring critically needed aid and assistance to improve elections in the United States, and I believe this motion to instruct will have a positive effect of reminding the conferees on both sides of the aisle that reasonable negotiations are critical to getting this conference report done in the very near future. It is not that we need reminding, but I think this helps. We simply cannot afford to deadlock this conference because either side makes unrealistic demands at the last minute.

Let us talk for a minute about what both sides agree on, and I think it is important to note. We agree that we should authorize substantial sums of Federal dollars to modernize election systems in the next few years. We agree that obsolete voting systems like punch cards and lever machines should be replaced as rapidly as possible. We agree that voters in all States should have their rights protected by imposing basic requirements. We agree that those requirements should include guaranteed access to voting machines and ensure ballot access and secrecy for those who have a form of a disability. We agree that they should guarantee a voter's right to review his or her ballot to correct errors before that ballot is cast. We agree that they should guarantee a voter's right to provisional ballots so no voter is turned away from the polls in the United States. We agree that there should be an election assistance commission to help States comply with these requirements. We agree that there should be strong enforcement by the Department of Justice to ensure that these provisions are fully complied with as the law of the land. We agree there should be research and pilot programs to develop and to test new technologies to improve our voting systems.

We also agree, Mr. Speaker, there should be programs to encourage both college and high school students across America to volunteer as poll workers or assistants where local election officials need them on a nonpartisan basis. We agree the rights of military and overseas voters should be protected and enhanced.

In addition to taking steps to make it easier to vote, we have agreed that steps must be taken to make it harder to cheat.

Leaders on both sides of the Capitol stand behind the antifraud provisions passed overwhelmingly by their prospective Houses. I am confident that these provisions to improve the integrity of our political process, along with the many other requirements we all agree upon should be imposed, will be included in a final package.

There are some who doubt that agreement can be reached. They say judgments have been made by some and that a partisan issue for the 2002 elections may be more valuable than the improvements in the process that would be achieved by this bill, and shame on anybody on either side of the aisle or anybody across the country that would want to politicize this.

□ 1545

I believe the basic core of this institution on both sides of the aisle and the basic core of advocacy groups across the Nation want to produce a product, and I know the conferees also do.

I reject the analysis that has been made that this will be held up because of an issue versus a product that is good for people. I know that we can set aside partisanship and get this bill passed, and we must. I want to take this opportunity to praise the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER), the ranking member on the Committee on House Administration.

I want to also praise members of the conference committee, Senators DODD, MCCONNELL, BOND, SCHUMER, the input of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS), and on our side of the aisle, members of the Committee on House Administration that produced this product and other conferees, including the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BLUNT) who has been extremely helpful.

I want to say something about the process for a little bit. There was debate on a select committee which I did not think was a bad idea, it was agreed to mutually on a bipartisan basis, and after the give-and-take and public debate over the issue, the bill and the idea came to our committee, frankly, from the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) to have the Help America Vote Act.

We diligently worked on it. Despite campaign finance reform, despite anthrax in the buildings, we continued to work on it. Why does it take so long? It is a complicated bill that is going to have good ramifications down the road, and it needed to be intensely worked on. It is a bill that I believe we can be proud of.

Without the help and assistance of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER), we would not be close to agreement; and I count on the gentleman's continued help and assistance to ensure that this bill is enacted before the end of the session.

Throughout the discussions, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) has insisted that we focus on the top priorities, such as getting this bill done as soon as possible so States can start to plan for the 2004 elections. Both sides of the aisle understand the importance of getting money out to local and State officials as rapidly as possible without a time-consuming and burdensome Federal bureaucracy getting in the way. We understand that there is no single issue that can be allowed to prevent this bill from passing. We are continuing to communicate and talk.

I also thank all of the groups who have encouraged and supported our efforts to get this bill passed, including the National Federation of the Blind, the National Association of Secretaries of State, the National Association of Counties, the National Association of Clerks and Recorders, the Election Center, and the advocacy groups that are out there with disabilities, civil rights and all of the other groups across this country that have had hearings and made input into the system.

There is much work left to be done, and I know we are running out of time, but I believe we can meet that challenge. I look forward to being on the floor in the near future and enacting a bill with broad bipartisan support, a bill that makes it easier to vote and harder to cheat, a bill that would demonstrate to all Americans that this Congress can put aside partisanship and improve the election process for all of our citizens.

There is a lot of talk across the country, and knowing the rules of the House, I will just say of things not going up and down the hallways and coming back here and there. Let me say on this particular issue, we want to make sure that all the bodies of the Congress work together and enact something that is going to be down the road for generations, something to be proud of and something which ensures integrity in our system.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER).

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) for yielding me this time, and for her leadership. She has been extraordinary since November 2000 working on this issue. I also want to thank the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HASTINGS) and the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON), the chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus. I also want to thank the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. LANGEVIN) who has done such yeoman work on this bill, along with the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY), who has been very responsible for the disabilities provision in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, let me begin by recognizing the outstanding leadership of the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS,) whom I mentioned, who has tirelessly championed the cause of election reform, as has the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HASTINGS), the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. LANGEVIN) and the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON). As chairwoman of the Democratic Caucus Special Committee on Election Reform, of which I was a member, the gentlewoman from California held hearings all over this country to learn what ails our election system. Many of the recommendations of her committee are included in the bill that was drafted.

As last week's primary in Florida confirms, the problems of the 2000 election will not go away until the Congress and the States enact meaningful national standards and offer States and local authorities the resources to improve their election infrastructure.

Mr. Speaker, I have said a lot of people worked hard on this legislation, and they have. But frankly, thanks in large measure to my indefatigable colleague from Ohio, we have made the progress that we have. We are closer than ever to enacting the most comprehensive package of voting reforms since the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) has been an unwavering advocate of reform, a strong proponent of the provisions that he believes are important to be in this bill; and frankly, expressing concerns about those provisions he thinks ought not be in the bill, but always focused on passing legislation that will assist the States and assist our voters in making our democracy even more perfect.

He has been an advocate of reform that will require States to offer provisional ballots to all voters whose registration, for one reason or another, is not properly included on the rolls; reform that will require States to maintain statewide computerized registration lists to ensure the most accurate, up-to-date rolls and minimize the number of voters who are incorrectly removed from voters' rolls; reforms that will reward States for retiring obsolete voting machines, especially the notorious punch card machines and their dangling chads, that prompted this Congress to act in the first place. And I might add that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) and others have brought to our attention as well the problems that the lever machines cause because of the unavailability of parts to repair those particular machines.

This bill includes reforms that require voting systems to be accessible for individuals with disabilities, a cause that the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. LANGEVIN) has been untiring in advocating to ensure all Americans, irrespective of disabilities, have access to the polling place, have a technology that they can use, and can cast their vote in secret. We thank the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. LANGEVIN) for his outstanding leadership.

I want to say that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) has been particularly focused on including nonvisual accessibility to the blind and visually impaired to allow them to vote privately and independently, and reforms that allow voters to review and correct their ballots before they are cast. I call that second chance voting. It is a critically important component of our bill because it will tell the voter that they voted for too many people, they did not vote for this position or that position, do you want to? So that the voter, when they leave the polling place, will have confidence that they have cast correctly a ballot which will reflect their views.

This bill includes reforms that do not weaken any existing voting rights laws and includes meaningful enforcement and ensures that every vote counts.

Mr. Speaker, this motion made by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) is intended to ensure that we on the conference committee complete our work prior to October 1, 2002. Our chairman supports that motion, and given the progress the conference committee has made in the past 7 days, I am optimistic that we will meet that deadline.

All of us have one person in this House to thank for that process, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY). Frankly, without the gentleman's leadership and his chairmanship of this committee, we would not be as far along as we are.

At the urging of the chairman of the Committee on House Administration, as well as the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, Senator DODD, Members will be happy to know that the principal conference members and their staffs have been meeting diligently long hours to resolve the outstanding issues that remain.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, at the beginning everyone sort of circled everyone; but I can assure Members there was honest, open, positive discussion occurring.

Motions to instruct are often intended to urge conference members to head in directions they may not want. This motion directs us to move in a direction we want to move. I thank the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) for her leadership and for this motion. I thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) for his commitment to the passage of this legislation. America will be a better place for this legislation having been adopted.

Mr. NEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) for his comments and his integrity and sincerity on this issue.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. LANGEVIN).

Mr. LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I first want to thank the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS) for offering this motion to instruct today and for her leadership on this very important issue. I also want to echo the comments of the gentleman from Maryland and thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) and, of course, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) as well for his hard work on this bill.

Mr. Speaker, as we enter the closing days of the 107th Congress, the House faces a number of legislative initiatives that we would like to complete. While many of these are necessary to keep our government running and to protect the American people, we must not forget our responsibility to protect the fundamental right to vote. The election debacle of November 2000 was not an isolated incident. Last week's primary in Florida demonstrated we still have serious problems with the administration of our election systems.

I know that many States, including Rhode Island, are poised to initiate substantial election reforms but are merely waiting for the Federal Government to issue guidelines and provide funding. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) were instrumental in crafting H.R. 3295 which passed the House with strong bipartisan support. While our bill differs from the other Chamber in several respects, these differences are not insurmountable. I know that the conferees of H.R. 3295 have the American people's best interests at heart, and I encourage them to work expeditiously to resolve the remaining disagreement and develop a conference report that we can pass before the end of the year.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support the Waters motion to instruct.

Mr. NEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HASTINGS).

Mr. HASTINGS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the motion to instruct election reform conferees being offered today by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS), the chairman of the Democratic Task Force on Election Reform. I appreciate the gentlewoman's work that she has done in the past on election reform, and I applaud the work that she continues to do on this issue that continues to burn at the heart of every American.

In all candor, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) are to be complimented by all of us, as well as the persons that have been mentioned heretofore, and all of the members of the task force that worked with them in developing our position.

I am a bit put out that in this same body where all of us stood with former Vice President Gore presiding, all of us that were here on that day to say that an election had been free and fair, are somewhere now scattered throughout Washington, and I recognize that Members have other agendas, but I am alarmed that this room is not full.

□ 1600

In Florida, my constituents are reaping the firsthand devastation of Federal inaction. During Florida's primary election last Tuesday, 14 counties in Florida faced similar problems to the ones that we faced on Election Day 2000. Ranging from malfunctioning voting equipment to uneducated poll workers, voters in my State never had a chance to benefit from the provisions that the House approved with the assistance of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY), the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS), and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) in the Help America Vote Act. Instead, last Tuesday was, to quote an overworked phrase, deja vu all over again. While Florida voters were robbed once again, Congress remains silent.

After the election in 2000, Governor Bush and President Bush said that that would never happen again. The President has every right to do as he is doing, traveling around the Nation to put his case before us as we move toward November. But not one peep has come from this President. I have heard about Iraq. I have heard everything about a defense authorization bill. We are here doing this in an effort to not be doing appropriations. We have not done but five of 13 in the House and this President has not signed one single solitary appropriations measure. I doubt very seriously if we will.

When history judges the work that the 107th Congress has done, it will undoubtedly view the debate we are having right now as the landmark failure of this body. Who would have ever thought that after the sham and debacle of an election we had in 2000, that a Member, Republican or Democrat, would ever need to come to the floor of this body urging House and Senate conferees to reach a deal on an election reform package?

I hope that my colleagues realize, and I am sure they do, that the calendar records 606 days have passed since Election Day 2000, while this body has spent time cutting taxes as we did yesterday and in some resolution we are going to bring up tomorrow to remind the Senate that they are supposed to make permanent some tax cut while we go forward talking about a war and not finishing up the war on terrorism and having all sorts of things from prescription drugs to everything facing us in our body politic. No doubt what we are more about is rewarding the wealthy corporate persons and furthering corporate irresponsibility. This body has neglected to do anything to reinstate integrity in the American election process.

Elections are the foundation of our representation. Representation is the foundation of our democracy. Thus, we must never find ourselves again questioning the methods by which we choose our leaders. I say, if the House can create a Department of Homeland Security in one month, then the election reform conference committee can certainly reach an agreement in a year.

Mr. Speaker, as I was walking over to the Capitol this afternoon to speak in support of the gentlewoman from California's motion, I was trying to think of how many times I have spoken out for election reform. Quite frankly, I cannot remember; but I know it is too many times.

Too many times have the American people's cries for fairness and democracy in our election system gone unanswered. Too many days have passed by since our last Federal election left former President Jimmy Carter proclaiming, "If the Carter Center were to grade the American election system, it would fail." Too many opportunities have passed when Congress has gone home early for the week before assuring Americans that their votes will always count. Before long, we will be saying that too many elections have occurred while Americans continue to vote on an election system that we know is broken. That is a notion that I am not willing to even consider and neither are the American people. If we fail to act, it is an outrage.

Mr. NEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Florida (Mr. FOLEY).

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I join together on the floor today with my colleague from Florida (Mr. HASTINGS) because I too have spoken at each of our occasions here on the floor, with the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) and others in urging passage of this important legislation.

What happened in Florida's primary election this year is an example of exactly why we need to complete this conference as soon as possible. The Florida legislature passed legislation that outlawed punch cards, included new technology, called for improved election management practices and policies and introduced a statewide computerized registration system. The State was not afraid to spend money to support this effort. They set aside $32 million to improve the way elections were run. The counties responded with approximately an additional $50 million of local money designed to complement this statewide initiative. It is very difficult for anyone to argue that Florida was not committed to changing the way elections were run in their State. In fact, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) and his staff spent the last 2 years studying elections across the country, talking to election officials, voters, disability advocacy groups, election machine vendors and other experts in the field. Based on what they learned, Florida spent more money on new voting equipment than any other State in the country during the last 2 years. They also made significant improvements in election management policy, including the introduction of provisional voting, second-chance voting, definitions of what constitutes a vote, and other improvements.

So what happened in Florida? Sixty-seven counties in Florida comprise our State. We heard about major problems in two counties, Dade and Broward. For those who tried to lay the blame at Governor Bush's feet, it is worth noting that the officials actually responsible for running those elections in these two counties are Democrats. The good news is that the overwhelming majority of Florida counties got it right. In addition to implementing new legislative districts, they changed the way they keep track of voter registration records, introduced new voting technology, they trained poll workers and educated voters on how this technology works.

Let me remind Members of my home county, Palm Beach County, where our supervisor of elections, Teresa LePore, who was much criticized during the 2000 election because of the butterfly ballot decided to take the new voting technology to virtually every group that would have her. She went to Kiwanis, she went to Rotary, she went to synagogues, she went to mosques, she went to shopping centers and displayed the new touch screen voting technology. She trained her workers. She educated her workers and her poll workers and her deputies. She actually had mock elections outside of public supermarkets in order for the community to be more comfortable with the voting machine. Thankfully, because of that effort and that time she took, we had very little problem in Palm Beach County. In fact, we had a 98.5 percent success in Florida. We are suffering the aftermath of two counties.

I regret that there were not a lot more people exercised about what happened in Dade and Broward. I was exercised that not every vote counted in the 2000 election, and I am convinced that some people should have been more vocal and vociferous because of what happened in Dade and Broward.

The gentleman from Ohio's staff of the Committee on House Administration observed primaries in Lee County, Florida. Lee County used the same new touch screen voting technology as 11 other counties in Florida did, including Broward; but they did things a little differently. They spent extra time recruiting and training poll workers. I want to underscore that. Extra time recruiting and training poll workers. Educating their voters, buying extra voting machines so voters could practice at the precinct. They even went to the trouble of making a video on how to use the new technology and had it play in each precinct in the county during election day. Lee County, Florida, home of our own PORTER GOSS. In addition, they installed modems in all the precincts so that the election results could be electronically transmitted to the central office as soon as the polls closed. The local media and voters declared the election in that county a success. This is how election reform should work. Proven in several counties. A few problems in two counties. So let us not minimize the importance of the legislation before us.

My contention from the beginning has been if we are going to implement meaningful reform, we cannot do it in a partisan manner. Managing good, solid elections that count every vote cast is not about what party you belong to. It is about sound public policy. Election officials need time to implement the meaningful changes that election reform will bring. It is imperative that we move this bill out of conference as soon as possible so that they are not rushed into making bad decisions, sending ill-trained poll workers to the polls, introducing new technology without educating voters, or repeating any of the other mistakes we saw in those two counties in Florida.

I commend the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HASTINGS), as I do others in our delegation, the gentlewoman from Florida (Ms. BROWN) and others who have also been vociferous in wanting to improve the election system not only in our home State but in every State of the Union. This is critical, it is timely, it is urgent; and I urge the conference to report out the bill.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to thank the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HASTINGS) for all the work he did on the special committee on reform. He supported it 100 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON).

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of this urgent motion to instruct conferees on election reform.

Mr. Speaker, the most fundamental issue facing all of us during this Congress is restoring the public's faith in democracy. To restore that faith in democracy, we must make sure that every vote cast is counted. Equal protection of voting rights laws requires an electoral system in which all Americans are able to register as voters, remain on the rolls once registered, and vote free from harassment. Ballots must not be misleading. And, again, every vote must count.

In the 2000 election, Florida was not the only State where American citizens were denied the full exercise of their constitutional franchise. It happened all over this Nation. Moreover, most of those excluded from democracy were Americans of color. That is why election reform has been the number one legislative priority of the Congressional Black Caucus. We will not be silenced until this Congress answers this call. This is not, however, a black issue or a white issue or a brown issue. It is an American issue. It is a red, white, and blue issue. The survival of our democracy depends on the accuracy and integrity of our election system. Just last week, we received yet another wake-up call from the Sunshine State reminding us that the time for election reform is now and that we must do whatever it takes to pass this election reform bill immediately.

I would like to thank Senator DODD, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS), the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER), the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) whom I have worked very closely with, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS), and all the others, most especially the African American delegation from Florida, for bringing the information and offering to be available to answer any questions at any time. I know that this election reform conference committee has been working diligently and they have come close to a compromise on this issue. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that soon, before we recess, this conference report will come out for us to vote on in an acceptable manner.

Now that we have come so close to compromise and now that the next round of Federal elections is right upon us, even though it probably will not affect it, the price for not passing election reform during this Congress is far too high. It is imperative that the conference committee continue its hard work and come to an agreement before the end of this month. We cannot afford to let this opportunity slip away.

I know, Mr. Speaker, how many hours the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER) and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. NEY) and Senator DODD have spent working on this issue. I have talked to someone every day on it. It is time for us to finalize this conference report and bring it forth.

Mr. NEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SHAW).

Mr. SHAW. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, as I understand it on both sides, I think there is great agreement with regard to the motion to instruct on this particular bill, so I am not here to debate that; but I am here, I think, to help set the record a little bit straight as to exactly what happened in Florida.

As we know, Florida was the middle of a hurricane during the last election, so it has received a great deal of attention. The Florida legislature spent a great deal of money in buying, purchasing and helping the counties put in place, as well as the county commissions, the state-of-the-art, or what we thought was the state-of-the-art voting machines, electronic machines. This was a new type of voting process for most of the counties in the State of Florida.

□ 1615

In my own home county of Broward County, the wheels sort of fell off the wagon.

Now, what exactly happened? According to the Registrar of Elections in Broward County, 150 of her workers did not show up, a lot of those that did were not properly trained, and there was great confusion within the voting places.

Many precincts opened late, as late as noon. In order to try to compensate for that, the Governor extended time for voting until 9 o'clock, but many of the precincts closed at 7 because they could not find the people that would stay over or because the word never got out to the poll workers that they were supposed to stay until 9.

Now, whose fault is this? I have heard too many people, and even Vice President Gore, former Vice President Gore was in the district today, trying to blame this on our Governor, Jeb Bush. Jeb Bush did not elect the Supervisor of Elections in Broward County; the people of Broward County did. Jeb Bush did not hire the poll workers that did not show up; the Supervisor of Elections did. Jeb Bush did not train the workers to operate the different voting machines. That is the responsibility of the Supervisor of Elections.

So, pray tell, what is the Governor's responsibility here, other than to support bringing state-of-the-art equipment into the State of Florida, which he did, which the state legislature did? There were just some colossal errors.

Unfortunately, with all the finger pointing, people wonder, what in the world? I even heard the President being blamed here on the floor a while ago. That makes absolutely zero sense. The President of the United States does not run the voting precincts in the State of Florida, the State of California, or any other State.

The Governor of the State of Florida, particularly in Broward County, his only responsibility is, perhaps you could argue, that if he does not remove the duly elected Registrar of Elections, that somebody could blame him for not removing this particular person. But it does not appear that is the way he is going. It appears he has sent down the Secretary of State, Jim Smith, who has come down and spent a great deal of time working with the people in Broward County to be sure this does not happen again. A citizen's committee has been set up.

The County Commission and our sheriff, Sheriff Jenne, has been working with the Registrar of Elections, doing everything they can to make this system work. The Governor has been totally cooperative. The Governor of the State of Florida is not the voter registrar in Broward County, and that is just the beginning and the end of it, and there is nothing further to really say with regard to that.

If people are going to blame the Governor, they should come here and say exactly what he did. If they are going to blame the President, they should come down and tell us what his responsibility is in getting people to the polls and getting the polls to work in Broward County.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAW. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman to please repeat the number of people that failed to show up at the Broward County polls that were workers that were allegedly hired by the Broward County Supervisor of Elections. Was it 150?

Mr. SHAW. One hundred fifty people.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will continue to yield, this is something I wanted to elaborate on. I think the gentleman has done a great job on it. The county elects their own supervisor who is charged and mandated with the task of carrying out the elections.

Mr. SHAW. The gentleman is correct. In Dade County, it is appointed by the Dade County Commission, so it is different. It is the way the charter is set up.

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman will yield further, one other thing I would like to elaborate on, is the Secretary of State, Jim Smith, who has recently been appointed, warned the Democratic Party officials about problems in Broward County, brought it to their attention. The State offered resources, the State tried to help, and the Broward County elected supervisor rejected all efforts to assist in the election.

This is different. Things were done, attempts were made to try to help during this critical and important election following 2000. All offers were rebuffed. I think that official bears sole, complete responsibility for the election outcome in Broward County, and Dade County has the same problem to address.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, reclaiming my time, I would like to conclude by saying that the Governor and State officials in Florida are doing everything possible. Our County Commission in Broward County is doing everything possible to be sure they get a full count in Broward County.

Interestingly enough, all but one of our County Commissioners is a Democrat, the Voter Registrar is a Democrat, Broward County will deliver a big Democrat vote for the Democrat nominee for Governor, and the Republican Governor, Jeb Bush, is doing everything in his power to see to it that all the people, Democrats and Republicans in Broward County, get a fair count this time, that they do not go through the fiasco that we went through last Tuesday.

So I would like to just conclude with that, that I wish our Registrar all the best on November 5. It is going to be closely watched, but I think with all the assistance we are getting that the Registrar will have a great day and a great evening, and we will end up all being very proud of what is going to happen in Broward County. Republicans and Democrats want to be sure every vote gets counted.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended this to be a platform for the defense of Jeb Bush or any other Governor, but, since it has been made such, the buck stops at the top.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentlewoman from the District of Columbia (Ms. NORTON).

Ms. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me time, and especially thank her for bringing this motion to instruct to the floor so we will not be put in the shameful position of perhaps going home again, we cannot go home again, without doing something about this bill.

Virtually every primary is over. We are 2 years past the worst election crisis in the United States of America. We have heard defense of Florida, we have heard partisan comments about the counties involved. The point of crisis has shifted from the States to the Congress of the United States.

We are sitting here with our thumbs in our mouths, knowing full well that Florida and every State of the Union cannot do it by themselves. That is really all Florida says to me. Florida is like a canary in the coal mine. Just as it was in the presidential election, we never would have learned without the fiasco of the 2000 election that we have broken election systems throughout the United States of America.

Florida redux is shameful, to be sure; to have the same crisis emerge in similar counties is shameful, to be sure. But we are going to have that over and over again unless we do our job.

Why name the President of the United States? Because he is the President of the United States, and it was his election, that is why. Because he has the bully pulpit, that is why. Because he ought to step up and say to the conference committee what the gentlewoman from California is saying: "Hey, shake it loose so we don't do it again." Yes, it is his responsibility, and it is especially our responsibility.

It is shameful that the NAACP has to go retail. It has had to go county by county to just settle a suit there on such basics as, I remember one of the provisions is that you have to provide an alternative way to vote in case you are challenged at the polls? Really? In 2002 we are just saying that?

In Virginia, I have read thousands of different things that have happened county by county as counties go by themselves retail trying to fix the system in Virginia. One county that had 600 overvotes was reduced to one last year. How many overvotes must there have been throughout the United States that nobody even knows about now because they have not been dealt with?

If you want to know what we have to do with Florida, it is known as congressional leadership, Federal leadership, and it is known as the right to vote. And that buck, yes, I say to the gentlewoman, stops at the top, and we are the top of that pyramid.

We did not know until Florida. My friends, now we know. That means now we are responsible. Any disagreement, as I have heard there is on voter ID, I just want to say right here is the most shameful, the most shameful cause of disagreement. The notion about just how much ID you ought to have before you, with your American self, can cast your vote, exercise your right to vote? It is a chilling reminder of years past.

I want to say right up front; this is a civil rights issue, only this time everybody understands the civil rights is not for African Americans alone. In Florida we saw people of all races and backgrounds, all educational backgrounds, got caught in what African Americans have been caught in for decades.

Let us free the American people and let them all vote in November.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE).

Mr. NEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). The gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE) is recognized for 4 minutes.

Ms. JACKSON-LEE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentlewoman and gentleman for yielding me time.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to thank the gentlewoman from California for this motion to instruct and for her leadership in chairing the Election Reform Task Force, which I had the pleasure of joining her on in several cities throughout the Nation. This is an important motion to instruct, but it is also an important conference.

I would like to add my appreciation to the gentleman from Ohio (Chairman NEY) and the ranking member, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER), for the work that they have done, along with the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS), and I serve on the conference committee. Also the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BARCIA), who is a leader on this issue, and many others.

I would like to speak to the importance of the conference and the work yet undone and the importance of this motion to instruct for October 1. I would like to emphasize that the Constitution and election reform is not partisan. The example that we saw in Florida is an issue that should be of concern to Republicans and Democrats, and I believe that this legislation will be a cornerstone to solving some of the problems when we have Federal requirements, even though we saw the legislature in Florida try to act upon it.

But let me move away from Florida and use Texas as an example of why this Federal bill is so very important. In the State of Texas we will be entering into one of the most historic elections come 2002, because, for the first time, we will have at the top of the ticket two individuals who are Americans, of course, but represent the great diversity of the State of Texas.

But in the State the election system is also diverse, but not to the positive, but to the negative. In the State of Texas our ballots are counted by hand. They are punch card ballots, they are write-in ballots, and, yes, in the largest county in Texas, they will be by E-Slate.

Texas has the ability to vote straight ticket, as many jurisdictions have. We are just discovering that the E-Slate that we have in the State of Texas, which I think will be in another county as well, does not function right for voters of either party that may choose to select their candidates by voting a straight ticket. That is a privilege of those who vote. That is a chilling effect where you cannot utilize certain equipment and vote the way you desire.

With Federal requirements, that will provide assistance to ensure that there is a consistency of vote throughout the state, but, more importantly, it will also provide training dollars which are so desperately needed.

I have to go home this weekend and test the machine. Others have tested it, as I have encouraged them to do, but I have to test it, because there is a problem. I believe this legislation has the ability to bring consistency and bring to people the privilege of voting that the Constitution and citizenship bestows upon them.

I hope that the leadership of this House and the gentleman from Ohio (Chairman NEY) and the ranking member, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HOYER), who work so well together, will look at the idea of a national ID, that we happen to have avoided in the immigration legislation and even to a certain extent in Homeland Security, that there is not a chilling effect, if you will, for people who come to the polls to vote, that we determine that you are able to vote, that we have standards, that we have uniform voting procedures, that we have requirements, that we have Federal oversight, but we do not chill people from voting, as did happen to all people in the last election.

Disabled people were prohibited from voting in particular areas, and Florida comes to mind. This legislation opens the doors to disabled persons.

I hope we can work through the question of purging, though I think there is a great response to the purging question. What that means is people being thrown off the rolls and not knowing they have been thrown off the rolls and legitimately wanting to cast their vote.

This is a civil rights question, but it is an American question, and I believe the members of the conference, including the chairman and ranking member and the leadership in the other body, if I might add, the chairman of the Committee on Rules in the other body, all have considered this an important challenge, and I hope by October 1st we will finish our work and finish it together and have a bill, not for partisanship, but for all Americans, to protect the civil rights of all Americans.

Mr. NEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Florida (Mrs. MEEK).

Mrs. MEEK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I thank my esteemed colleague, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS), for bringing this to our attention. I have a very short comment to make. Number one, it is time, regarding the instructions she has given to the conferees, it is time we had fair voting in Florida. It is time we not depend on the machine. We need leadership. The Governor of Florida, the Dade County Elections Commission, none of them have acted in good faith. We need this. We need the Federal Government to come in and say, look, we want a fair election. It is time for one. We cannot pass the buck. Even with the machines, if we do not have the proper leadership to direct this, it cannot run in the right way.

We know that Florida has been cheated, we know that this country has been cheated, so I will not stand here and make allowances for anyone. We need this instruction that the good Congresswoman has passed on to the conferees. It is time that they listen for once and pass this and make sense when they do it and not look for some bipartisan kind of thing that is going to please everybody. Please the American public. Please the people who work so hard for the vote. Please the people who died for the vote. So I make no amends for any of them.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this Motion to Instruct the Election Reform Conferees to produce a Conference Report before October 1, 2002, and I commend my good friend Congresswoman MAXINE WATERS for offering it.

Mr. Speaker, election reform is long overdue. How many more election day catastrophes, like last week's voting in Florida, will be required for this Congress to get the message that our people need a real election reform bill and they need it now?! I don't have the time to detail all of the problems that occurred in last week's voting in South Florida, but the problems were extremely serious.

I have read the same newspaper and magazine accounts that all of you have read suggesting that the election reform conferees have not yet been able to work out their differences, and that election reform may be dead for this Session of Congress. Mr. Speaker, this outcome is absolutely unacceptable. This Congress will have failed the American people if it does not pass a strong election reform Conference Report, and send it to the President for his signature before this Session ends.

Mr. Speaker, last week's voting revealed that the many problems that plagued the 2000 Presidential election in South Florida are continuing. I didn't just hear about the problems from my constituents. I experienced some of the problems myself.

Miami-Dade County allowed early voting in advance of the September 10th primary. Yet when I stopped by a library branch in my precinct to cast an early vote, I was delayed from voting for more than 30 minutes because the only computer available was not working and the election officials on duty said that they couldn't verify that I was an eligible voter!

Even though I presented my driver's license, my new voter registration card and other photo identification, I still was not allowed to vote for over thirty minutes while poll workers attempted to check Election Department records to verify my eligibility.

While these poll workers tried to follow new Miami-Dade procedures to contact the main elections office in the case of a computer glitch, they were unable to contact the Elections Supervisor to verify my eligibility. During this thirty minute period, I saw at least two voters who wanted to vote early leave the polling place without voting.

As all of you know, I'm not easily deterred, especially when my rights are being threatened, so even though I was extremely unhappy with the Department's inability to verify my eligibility during this delay, I did not leave the polling place. Instead, I had my District Office contact the County Elections Supervisor and his staff. While I did not speak with the Election Supervisor himself, I understand that Elections Department staff advised that the Elections Supervisor checked the department's records personally to verify my eligibility, and then the poll workers were told which absentee ballot I should be given.

Mr. Speaker, if a Senior Member of Congress with a long history of voting in each election, and someone who knows how to assert herself, had this type of problem when trying to vote, all of us know the problems that new or infrequent voters, or those voters who speak a different language such as Haitians, are facing.

Mr. Speaker, we can and must do better than this. We need to fund the best election technology available and make it available on an equal basis to all of our communities. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we need more than just new and fancy machines. We need to ensure that our poll workers are properly trained in how to operate those machines, and in election law and procedure. Those workers also must share a commitment to seeing to it that all of our people have an equal chance to vote and to have their vote counted. In short, Mr. Speaker, our elections officials must do more to make real election reform a reality for all of our people.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forget the lessons of the 2000 election, and last week's Florida fiasco. None of us can rest until we ensure that every vote counts and is counted. I urge all of my Colleagues to support the Waters Motion to Instruct Conferees, commend Congresswoman WATERS for offering it, and yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the remaining time.

Elections are the heart of our democracy. We cannot afford to allow another Federal election to come and go without addressing the myriad problems in our election system. We must complete action on election reform legislation. We must complete it before we adjourn for the November election. It is time for Congress to assure the American people that every vote will count in the United States of America.

We do this for all of America, but African Americans are particularly sensitive on this subject, because we fought so hard for the right to vote. I can tell my colleagues in that election where we saw a database identifying so-called felons where people who had never been arrested in their lives found themselves on that list, where people could not cast their vote because they could not find their names on the polls, it was reflections of yesteryear by a different name. We have our forefathers and foremothers who were made to pay poll taxes, who were intimidated, who were forced to have to read the Constitution in order to prove their literacy. We cannot afford to have America not fix this election system that is obviously broken and has been demonstrated to be such.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this motion and tell the conferees to complete their work before October 1.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIMPSON). Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to instruct offered by the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WATERS).

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIMPSON). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, and under a previous order of the House, the following Members will be recognized for 5 minutes each.

A POLITICAL MISTAKE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PAUL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, I have for years advocated a moral and constitutional approach to our foreign policy. This has been done in the sincerest belief that a policy of peace, trade, and friendship with all nations is far superior in all respects to a policy of war, protectionism, and confrontation. But in the Congress I find, with regards to foreign affairs, no interest in following the precepts of the Constitution and the advice of our early Presidents.

Interventionism, internationalism, inflationism, protectionism, jingoism and bellicosity are much more popular in our Nation's capital than a policy of restraint.

I have heard all the arguments on why we must immediately invade and occupy Iraq and have observed that there are only a few hardy souls left in the Congress who are trying to stop this needless, senseless, and dangerous war. They have adequately refuted every one of the excuses for this war of aggression; but, obviously, either no one listens, or the unspoken motives for this invasion silence those tempted to dissent.

But the tragic and most irresponsible excuse for the war rhetoric is now emerging in the political discourse. We now hear rumblings that the vote is all about politics, the November elections, and the control of the U.S. Congress, that is, the main concern is political power.

Can one imagine delaying the declaration of war against Japan after Pearl Harbor for political reasons? Or can one imagine forcing a vote on the issue of war before an election for political gain? Can anyone believe there are those who would foment war rhetoric for political gain at the expense of those who are called to fight and might even die if the war does not go as planned?

I do not want to believe it is possible, but rumors are rampant that looking weak on the war issue is considered to be unpatriotic and a risky political position to take before the November elections. Taking pleasure in the fact that this might place many politicians in a difficult position is a sobering thought indeed.

There is a bit of irony over all of this political posturing on a vote to condone a war of aggression and force some Members into a tough vote. Guess what, contrary to conventional wisdom, war is never politically beneficial to the politicians who promote it.

Presidents Wilson and Roosevelt were reelected by promising to stay out of war. Remember, the party in power during the Korean War was routed in 1952 by a general who promised to stop the bloodshed. Vietnam, which started with overwhelming support and hype and jingoistic fervor, ended President Johnson's political career in disgrace and humiliation. The most significant plight on the short term of President Kennedy was his effort at regime change in Cuba and the fate he met at the Bay of Pigs. Even Persian Gulf War 1, thought at the time to be a tremendous victory, with its aftermath still lingering, did not serve President Bush, Sr.'s reelection efforts in 1992.

War is not politically beneficial for two reasons: innocent people die, and the economy is always damaged. These two things, after the dust settles from the hype and the propaganda, always make the people unhappy. The euphoria associated with the dreams of grandiose and painless victories is replaced by the stark reality of death, destruction, and economic pain. Instead of euphoria, we end up with heartache as we did after the Bay of Pigs, Korea, Vietnam, Somalia, and Lebanon.

Since no one wants to hear anymore of morality and constitutionality and justice, possibly some will listen to the politics of war, since that is what drives so many. A token victory at the polls this fall by using a vote on the war as a lever will be to little avail. It may not even work in the short run. Surely, history shows that war is never a winner, especially when the people who have to pay, fight, and die for it come to realize that the war was not even necessary and had nothing to do with national security or fighting for freedom, but was promoted by special interests who stood to gain from taking over a sovereign country.

Mr. Speaker, peace is always superior to war; it is a political winner.

GROWING CONCERN OF CHILD MODELING ON THE INTERNET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FOLEY) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss an issue that is of prime importance, I hope, to many American families and their children; and it is as a member of the Congressional Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children that I rise today, because I have introduced legislation that deals with a growing concern of child modeling on the Internet.

What occurs is that young girls, 10, 12, 13 years old, are encouraged by their parents and aided and abetted by individuals to display themselves on the Internet for viewership, if you will, people who pay a fee, a monthly fee in order to view the site. I am not going to mention the names of the sites, because I do not want to encourage anybody to go, but to understand the gravity of the situation we are facing. The girls initially pose in not very suggestive ways. They may be appearing next to a horse; they may be outside in their bathing suit; they may be holding a tennis racket. As time goes on, they are encouraged to pose more provocatively for their viewers. They are asked to expose themselves, they are asked to wear things like belly dancing outfits, they are asked to emulate an activity that is highly inappropriate for somebody their age. Many of these parents are deceived into thinking that the person witnessing their child on the Internet is another young person, a young girl or boy who is taking part in this little modeling expedition and encouraging their children or their friend to continue their activities as a child model.

What we found out through investigation at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children is that often, the people that are paying $19 a month to view these sites are pedophiles. They are often people who are depraved and who are looking at 11- and 12-year-old girls, and they are e-mailing each other back and forth saying, why do you not do this or pose like this. It is such a serious problem that I have designed legislation that I hope will answer some of the concerns.

Today on John Walsh's show we talked for an hour about this very topic, and Mr. WALSH had on two mothers, two daughters, and two of the promoters of these Web sites in order for us all to hear from them why they thought this was an appropriate and legitimate act for their child to pursue. Oftentimes they said it was to raise money for the child's college, even though one of the girls on the show quit school and was now being home schooled because she said she had asthma and could not conduct the hard work of school because of her condition. Nonetheless, she would find time in her day to be a child model. What we heard was startling, that they would allow their child to come into contact of people of such ill repute.

Now, again, I urge people to listen to what I am saying. I am not suggesting that young girls cannot be models, and I am not suggesting that there is not an appropriate place in commerce for young people to display their talents; but what we are finding on these particular Web sites, and it was first brought to my attention by a local NBC affiliate in Florida, in Miami, WTBJ, they had done an investigation on somebody who actually happened to live in my district and they went on to find these cases where the girl was posing. All I want to suggest to people is first, to my colleagues, look at the legislation.

There has been much written about this legislation in the mainstream media. There has been much discussed, in fact, on national radio shows about this very topical issue and the legislation I have sponsored. We hope we can generate the debate in order to have parents hear our voices on what I hope is a clarion call for them to be very, very careful of what they subject their young children to.

If we look at almost every case of abduction, every case of rape, every instance where a child has gone missing, typically, when they find the suspected person who has committed a crime, when the agents, the police officers raid the house, they often find reams of pornography, reams of material that uses young children in a provocative, nasty, and disturbing way. So there is a cause and effect between the harm caused to these children and their activities or the utilization of this type of material.

Now, not every girl is going to be molested or harmed, and I understand that. But what they have to be aware of is that too much is occurring on the Internet today that should cause parents considerable concern. First and foremost, I urge every parent to make certain that the computer they use is in the family room where they can observe their young children using the computer.

□ 1645

The person that may be chatting with their child may not be the person who purports to be on the other end. They may say they are a fellow student from school. It may turn out to be the neighbor next door who has ill intent on their child. We should warn our children not to be engaged in conversations with adults on the Internet, and certainly warn them never to meet a parent or adult out in a public setting after a chat on the Internet.

I hope my colleagues will look at this legislation very carefully and consider cosponsoring it, because I do think there is an appropriate time now to address some of the growing concerns on this issue. I urge my colleagues to do so.

OPPOSING THE PRESIDENT'S EFFORTS TO LAUNCH ILLEGITIMATE FIRST STRIKE AGAINST IRAQ

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. WOOLSEY) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Ms. WOOLSEY. Mr. Speaker, I stand today in opposition to the President's efforts to launch an illegitimate first strike against Iraq. The President's war fervor threatens the lives of thousands of American soldiers and Iraqi civilians, ignores international law, undermines our fight against terrorism, and may make average Americans less safe. Yet, the President presses for an invasion.

It is true that Saddam Hussein is a dictator. He is a bad man, and the world would be better off without him. But the world will also be better off if the United States works within the scope of international institutions instead of launching an unprovoked first strike against Iraq.

America's greatest asset is our moral authority, not our military power. Attacking a sovereign country unprovoked forfeits that authority completely.

It is true that Saddam has repeatedly violated United Nations resolutions, but it is also true that only the United Nations has the authority to enforce those resolutions. Furthermore, none of those resolutions call for regime change in Iraq, an often-stated goal of the President's.

On top of all of that, a first strike invasion of Iraq could actually undermine America's vital interests in the Mideast and around the world. It is unfortunate but true that Iraq's neighbors mistrust the United States even more than they mistrust Saddam Hussein.

Invading Iraq could have drastic repercussions by energizing extremists looking to overthrow governments across the Mideast. Such an outcome is even more likely if Saddam Hussein responds to an invasion by retaliating against Israel. If he succeeds in killing Israelis and polarizing the Mideast, what then?

The President claims Iraq's weapons of mass destruction are more than can be justified for aggression. In America, we must hold ourselves to a higher standard. Those weapons programs are frightening, but policy must be based on fact, not fear.

It is believed that Saddam's nuclear weapons program was 95 percent destroyed by 1998, when the U.N. inspection teams pulled out. There is no reason to think that a new round of weapons inspectors will not be just as effective. Meanwhile, President Bush has sent a message of his own by backing out of the ABM treaty, refusing to sign the Kyoto treaty, refusing to be a party to the mine ban treaty, withdrawing the U.S.' signature to the International Criminal Court treaty, and embracing the use of mini nukes.

Is it any wonder that other nations hesitate to support a first strike invasion when we in the United States ignore the same international standards that we accuse Saddam Hussein of disregarding? We must take a long, hard look at our own policies to ensure that we do not violate the same rules we expect others to follow.

As a Nation, it is our responsibility to live up to our own democratic ideals. We owe it to our children to exercise the full range of diplomatic options in Iraq so we can prevent a war that will cost thousands of lives while at the same time giving a boost to our real enemies: The terrorists who planned September 11.

War represents a failure of civilization. It is a last resort. America's strength is our commitment to moral action, and a government based on the rule of law. That law must never be silent, and our sensibilities must never be intimidated.

UNANSWERED QUESTIONS REGARDING ADMINISTRATION PLANS FOR IRAQ

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PUTNAM). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DEFAZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DEFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, today, before the Committee on Armed Services, Secretary Rumsfeld, who has made up his mind, said that the President has not yet made up his mind about a preemptive war and an invasion and occupation of Iraq.

Now, when the Secretary was asked how he reconciled that with the rush to adopt a resolution authorizing the use of force here in the House if the President had not yet made up his mind and could not articulate the case, he really did not answer the question. To tell the truth, I was a bit put off by that, but that is a key question which needs to be answered.

On September 5, I sent the President a letter signed by 17 other Members of the United States House of Representatives. We were pleased that the President had recognized the authority of the Congress, the sole authority of the Congress for declarations of war and use and initiation of force, except in the immediate defense of the United States, as per the Constitution and the War Powers Act; but that we felt that the President had a number of very important questions to answer before Congress should even begin the debate on such a resolution.

I fear they are really putting the cart before the horse here. They want a resolution without making the case. The President gave an eloquent speech at the U.N. last week, but many of the things he talked about, the offenses of Saddam Hussein were in fact things that had happened during the Reagan administration, during the administration of Bush I, in fact, such as the horrible gassing of people within his own country and the U.S. aiding him in his war against Iran before we dropped our friendship and support of his horrible regime. Many of these things took place then.

Then he went on to make the case for the U.N. resolutions which have been violated. We agree there, that this is an odious individual. He is not worthy of leading any nation. He has gassed and killed his own people, promoted religious and ethnic strife, murdered all his potential political opponents. I wish he could be deported to another planet, but right now, he is in power in his country. Hopefully, some people in his country will find a way to overthrow him and get rid of him.

But the question for us in the United States Congress is, should we authorize the first ever preemptive war in the history of the United States, and what is the immediate and serious nature of the threat that would have us break from all precedents in our history and all the precedents of international law? Those are the questions that are embodied in this letter.

Quite truthfully, thus far in both unclassified and classified briefings, and I cannot talk about what they did talk about in classified briefings, but I can tell Members what they do not talk about in classified briefings. They have not talked about anything in the classified briefings that we have not read in USA Today or heard on CNN, so they have yet to make an effective case that somehow he has been transmogrified from this reprehensible dictator in a mostly impoverished developing or Third World country to this incredible and immediate threat to the integrity of the United States of America.

They can find no links to al Qaeda, who is an immediate threat to the United States of America. In fact, I would say that we are being distracted, as are many of our allies and friends, and not-so-good allies and friends around the world, from the pursuit of al Qaeda and wiping out that threat by propping up suddenly this new threat.

I think a lot of this, unfortunately, is probably left over from his father's administration. Many of the foremost advocates of this preemptive war served in Bush's father's administration, and are aggrieved that they did not then so-called "finish the job."

But the same problems that confronted Colin Powell then confront us now. Probably his military is not that significant; maybe, maybe not. Maybe there will not be a lot of casualties. Maybe this can be done without a lot of civilian casualties. Sure, we can work through all of that. But then what? Then what?

I heard one Senator say that we are going to rule Iraq. We are going to rule Iraq, a country of more than 60 million people with an unbelievably fractious history, in the middle of the most volatile region on Earth, with the problems with the Shi'as and the Sunnis and the Kurds and the Turks and all those other things, and we are going to rule Iraq?

They have to have not only an entrance strategy and a rationale for this war, they need an exit strategy that they have to explain to the American people and this Congress before they should receive any sort of authorization to do anything in that area.

WAR WITH IRAQ

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. McDERMOTT) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Speaker, there is probably no issue that this House will deal with of the gravity of the one we are facing. Sending this country to war, putting our young people, men and women, in harm's way is a heavy responsibility. It cannot be done on the basis of misinformation.

Some of us who serve here served in the Vietnam era. I dealt with casualties for 2 years coming back from Vietnam. The young men and young women of the Seventh Fleet came to Long Beach Naval Station, where I was the chief psychiatrist. I saw what happens to people in war, so I do not come out here with an easy heart to say, well, let us go off and do this and do that. I think it has to be thought through very carefully what this country is doing, because if we put our people on the line, they have to know what they are doing.

If we say to the world that we can make a preemptive strike, we do not like what that person is doing, and we are not sure exactly what he is doing, but we are pretty sure we do not like what he is doing so we are going to take him out, when this country moves to that point, we are moving into a very dangerous period.

I want to read a quote. It was not said in this body, it was said on the other side: "I believe that history will record that we have made a great mistake in subverting and circumventing the Constitution of the United States. I believe this resolution to be a historic mistake. I believe that within the next century, future generations will look with dismay and great disappointment upon a Congress which is now about to make such a historic mistake."

Now, we went to war in Vietnam with a voice vote in the House of Representatives.

□ 1700

No recorded votes. In the Senate they had a vote. Two Members spoke against it and voted against it. One of them was this speech I just read by Wayne Morse of Oregon. Another Senator voted for it but asked a question. He said, "I do not want to do this because I think we are going to wind up with 500,000 troops on the ground." They went down and asked President Johnson and President Johnson called Gaylord Nelson and said, "Gaylord, for heaven's sake you know I am not going to do anything like that." He lied to him. He lied to him.

And when people tell me they have facts, that they know that there are weapons out there, there are nuclear weapons, that, oh, the United States is in grave danger, we knew what Saddam Hussein was doing with those weapons when he turned them on the Iranians. We were encouraging him. We did not like this bunch over in Iran, Ayatollah Khomeini and all that bunch. So we said, Hey, Saddam, go get him and we will give you some weapons, and we knew what he was doing.

When this country decides they are going to take out a leader somewhere, one ought to look at history. There was a country called Iran, and the leader was a guy named Mossadegh. He had been elected by the people. He was the Prime Minister elected in Iran. The United States Government did not like him because his politics were kind of a little bit to the wrong direction, whatever that was. So they decided to take him out and install a king. They brought back the Shah of Iran and put him on the throne. So in 1979 things erupted there. Somebody said to me, Well, gee, Jim, we got away with 25 free years. Is that the kind of foreign policy this country wants to pursue? Do we want to say we are going to go to any country and we are going to take out whatever is there and put in our guy and then we will use him? The reason we did not like Mossadegh, the reason we do not like Saddam Hussein, it all has to do with oil, who has control of the oil. Mossadegh was talking about nationalizing. Saddam did. This is not an issue for us to do a regime change, simply on oil. We must be careful.

SEEKING PEACE IN THE MIDDLE EAST

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PUTNAM). Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from California (Ms. LEE) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Ms. LEE. Mr. Speaker, I think that we all are in agreement that the world and the Iraqi people would be better off if Saddam Hussein were not in power, but I also think we all can agree on the fact that our world would be better off with a peaceful resolution to the current crisis and one which respects the rule of law and the role of the United Nations. That is why I rise tonight, Mr. Speaker, to urge this Congress and our country to renew our commitment to working with the United Nations and our friends and allies to advance peace and security in the Persian Gulf region. We need to act, but we do not have to rush to war. We have alternatives.

We have been told by President Bush and other members of the administration that we have to attack Iraq because our Nation is in imminent danger from Saddam Hussein. However, neither the Congress nor the public have been shown evidence of that or linking Saddam Hussein to 9-11. We have received no proof that Iraq has the means or intent to use weapons of mass destruction against us. We have not been told why the danger is greater today than it was a year or 2 ago or why we must rush to war rather than pursuing other options.

So tomorrow I will introduce a resolution offering a road map to such an alternative. This resolution emphasizes the importance of working through the United Nations to assure Iraq's compliance with U.N. Security Council resolutions and cease-fire agreements and to advance peace and security throughout the region beginning with full unfettered inspections.

During the 1990's, United Nations inspections teams succeeded in destroying tons of weapons in Iraq in spite of Iraq's attempts to obstruct their mission. They were on a search and destroy mission and they accomplished that. Today we need to renew that inspections process in the interest of our own security. We do not know the extent of Iraq's possible development of weapons of mass destruction and thus the extent of risk to us. That is why we need inspections. The President has called on the United Nations to assume its responsibilities. In fact the United Nations was established to deal with just such international crises. So let us work with them to make that happen.

But still on the other hand, the administration and others call for a preemptive first strike against Iraq. The cost of such action would be enormous, starting with a grave risk to American servicemen and women and to Iraqi civilians who will be caught in the crossfire. A preemptive first strike would also seriously damage our relationship with friends and allies, all of whom are strongly opposed to an assault. Statesmen such as Kofi Annan and Nelson Mandela have beseeched us to turn away from this disastrous course. Many Middle Eastern countries that supported the United States in the Gulf War will not support this attack and warn of long-term catastrophic consequences.

Such a war carries enormous cost. The Wall Street Journal estimates that it may cost as much as from 100 to $200 billion. When we have no proof that Iraq was tied to 9-11 and no proof that we are in imminent danger, why would we rush to spend $200 billion that could be invested in health care, education, housing, domestic security, and other vital needs here at home? Why are we rushing into a war with such a huge price tag for our foreign relations and our own budget when we have viable and many more effective alternatives? Why would we set such a devastating precedent?

There are what, eight known nuclear powers in the world? At least two of them, India and Pakistan, have long been on edge with each another. According to the doctrine of preemption, either of those countries could launch an attack because they are afraid of what the other might do. Is that the kind of world we want to live in? Is that the precedent that we want to take? We will be setting that. We will be setting this new standard.

President Bush laid out an axis of evil consisting of Iran, Iraq, and North Korea. Which dictator will be next?

Where does preemption end? So the resolution that I will introduce tomorrow resolves that the United States should work through the United Nations to seek a peaceful resolution to the crisis in Iraq through mechanisms such as inspections, negotiation, and regional cooperation. We do not have to go to war. We still have alternatives. It is up to us to pursue them.

Mr. Speaker, I urge Members to cosponsor my resolution and join us in taking this message to the American people.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS FOR AMERICAN SENIORS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from Maine (Mr. ALLEN) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the minority leader.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, there is a lot that is important to the American people that is being lost in the current focus on the situation in Iraq and the administration's plans for regime change and a military invasion. And I want to spend this evening talking about one of those issues that is getting less attention than it deserves.

I am talking about the fact that in my home State of Maine and all across this country, seniors who need prescription drugs in many cases simply cannot afford to buy them. In my office, my district office in Maine, people are coming in all the time, calling on the phone or stepping into the office and basically saying, What can I possibly do? I can no longer afford my prescription drugs.

People who have a Social Security check each month of $800 to $1,200 can wind up with $400, $500 a month in prescription drug costs, and the math just does not work. They cannot do it. People are, in fact, giving up food in order to buy their medicine or giving up their medicine in order to pay the rent or buy food.

We have been dealing with this problem for years. Back in 1998 I introduced a bill that would provide a 30 percent discount to all Medicare beneficiaries and the cost of all of their prescription drugs at no significant cost to the Federal Government. But the pharmaceutical industry weighed in, lobbied heavily, described the plan as price controls even though it is one that is widely employed by other industrialized nations and nothing has happened on that front.

The Democratic Caucus year after year has proposed a Medicare prescription drug benefit. That is a benefit for Medicare beneficiaries operating in the way that part B of Medicare does, the way doctors, the expenses for physicians is covered, that is, seniors would pay a certain amount per month and get a significant portion of their expenses covered, both by the amount they pay and by contributions from general revenues. Well, that is what we thought ought to appear here.

But tonight I want to spend some time talking about what really goes on here in Washington, what really goes on out in the field, and why we do not have even a discount for Medicare beneficiaries or a Medicare benefit. And we may remember, it has been a long time, but some may remember in one of the debates, one of the Presidential debates in the year 2000, President Bush said, I support a Medicare prescription drug benefit.

I knew what he meant. Lots of people in this Congress knew what he meant. But never in the past 2 years has the administration presented a plan for a Medicare prescription drug benefit. Not one.

Let us look at a little bit of what has been going on in the Congress and why we have not been able to accomplish what we should. Let us look for a moment at the last election cycle, 1999 to 2000. The pharmaceutical industry in that time period, according to the consumer watchdog group Public Citizen, spent $177 million lobbying Members of Congress and $20 million in campaign contributions. So that is $200 million that the pharmaceutical industry spent in those 2 years in order to try to get its way.

At the same time they employed in the year 2000, 625 lobbyists here in Washington. Think about it. There are only 535 Members of the Senate and the House put together, but the pharmaceutical industry hired 625 lobbyists to make sure that their views were well represented in the Congress.

But that is not the end of the story. In the same time period, that election cycle, the pharmaceutical industry was the largest interest group spending money on political ads, so-called issue ads, of any group in the country. They spent $50 million. And we can be sure, we can be sure based on their advertising so far in this cycle that they will far exceed that number.

Let us take a look at how these groups operate. The pharmaceutical industry not only has legions of professional lobbyists, but it is also funding what they call grass roots groups. A lot of us call this Astroturf lobbying because the grass is manufactured. And I want to call attention to a couple of those groups.

One group is the 60 Plus Association, which not so long ago did an ad in the Houston Chronicle, an ad thanking the majority whip, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DELAY), for his work on a prescription drug benefit plan. And the advertisement of the 60 Plus Association, we need to know, is funded by the pharmaceutical industry. It sounds like a group just of grass roots seniors, but it is not. It is funded by the pharmaceutical industry. Here is what the ad said. It said: "Results, not politics, for American seniors." And it goes on and on talking about this particular publication.

What we need to know, what people need to know about this industry and this campaign, Mr. Speaker, is that 2 days after the House Republicans unveiled their prescription drug plan back in June, a plan that was backed by the pharmaceutical industry, pharmaceutical companies were among 21 donors paying $250,000 each for special treatment at a GOP fund-raising gala headed by President Bush.

That same week, a senior House Republican leadership aide was quoted in the newspaper as saying that Republicans are "working hard behind the scenes on behalf of PHARMA," the industry association, "to make sure that the party's prescription drug plan for the elderly suits drug companies."

In fact, the House Committee on Energy and Commerce during markup of the Republican prescription drug bill had to break early that day so that Republican law makers could attend the dinner, and that was reported in the Washington Post on June 19, 2002. At that time, the drug lobby had financed a massive $4.6 million issue ad campaign in 18 competitive districts, some of them held by Republicans.

This September one ad in the Houston Chronicle praising the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DELAY) for the plan he supports is really a remarkable document. The pharmaceutical industry wrote the bill, wrote the Republican prescription drug bill. It passed by a very narrow majority on essentially a party line vote, and now the pharmaceutical industry goes out running ads thanking the Republicans for passing the bill that the pharmaceutical industry wrote. If people have enough money in this country, they can do a lot to hoodwink the American people.

Let us take a look at this particular ad and just talk about some of the allegations made here. The suggestion is that the Republican prescription drug plan includes a guaranteed drug benefit under Medicare for all seniors, but what the ad does not tell us is that it does not provide a guaranteed defined benefit with a guaranteed premium, and the reason for that is that the plan relied on insurance companies to provide the benefit. It was not a Medicare benefit. It was an Aetna benefit, a CIGNA benefit, a United benefit. It was something, but it was not a benefit, and we can look through that entire bill and look for the number that seniors will have to pay to be part this so-called Medicare prescription drug benefit plan and we cannot find the number anywhere in the bill because it does not exist, because what the bill consists of is a subsidy to insurance companies in the hope that they will turn around and provide stand-alone prescription drug insurance to seniors, a kind of policy that does not exist at all today and probably will never exist but which is the heart and soul, if those are the words, of the Republican bill.

Let me deal with the other four allegations here. The suggestion is that this will reduce out-of-pocket costs by up to 70 percent, but what the ad does not tell us is that those seniors with drug costs between $2,000 and $3,700, within that group, will have to pay 100 percent out-of-pocket if the insurance companies, given the subsidy, offer the plan that is assumed by the Republican prescription drug bill, all of which is highly unlikely.

The third claim is that this plan, the Republican plan, would offer seniors the flexibility to choose the plan that best meets their need, but what the ad does not say is that the plans under the Republican prescription drug bill are not under the Medicare program but private insurance companies and HMOs, and as someone who comes from the State of Maine, it is very clear to me that Maine, another rural State, is going to be one of the last places where insurance companies rush in and say we really want to provide prescription drug insurance to seniors, a group that represents 12 percent of the population but buys 33 percent of all prescription medications.

Then the fourth claim in this ad run by the astroturf organization in favor of the pharmaceutical industry is that it will provide complete protection against catastrophic drug costs, but it does not say that between $2,000 and $3,700 a person pays 100 percent out of pocket, and the catastrophic protection assumes that again there will be an insurance company to provide the benefit.

The final claim here is that there is no government bureaucrat between a person and their doctor, but there is someone between them and their doctor, and that will be the private insurance company, the HMO who will decide what drugs will be available under what plans. One of the problems with that is, unlike Medicare, where the benefits are reasonably stable, known in advance, consistent from year to year, where the premium changes only a slight difference from year to year, when it comes to HMOs and private insurance companies, what will happen, as it has in the Medicare+Choice market, is every year people will be laid off if the company is not making money in a particular area. The premium can be changed, the benefits can be changed at will, and despite the fact that in each of the last 4 or 5 years hundreds of thousands of people each year for a total of several million have withdrawn from the Medicare+Choice plans, that is, managed care for Medicare beneficiaries, despite that fact, that is the model that is being relied on under the Republican prescription drug plan.

The bottom line is real simple. Having written the bill for the Republican majority, having watched it pass here in the House, now the pharmaceutical industry is out running ads under the name of other organizations, trying to persuade the American people that Republican Members of Congress who are marching in lockstep with the pharmaceutical industry should be congratulated by seniors, ostensibly for doing what seniors want, but in fact, doing what the pharmaceutical industry wants.

I notice my colleague from Arkansas, a tireless advocate for seniors, is here, and at this time I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. BERRY).

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my good friend, the gentleman from Maine (Mr. ALLEN), and not only for his great friendship but for his leadership in this Congress and in the time that we have served together on this issue.

Here we are again, and it is a sad day in America. America is better than this. We can do better. We know how to do better. This issue is not something we do not know how to fix. We know what to do. This Congress is full of good people on both sides of the aisle. We know what to do about this issue. It is just simply not that complicated.

Here we are today, late in the afternoon, the session is over with for the day. No more votes to be taken. We are not going to vote on anything that is going to change anybody's lives or very likely ever become law tomorrow. Nothing is happening on the floor of the United States House this week. Nothing happened last week. Very likely nothing is going to happen next week or the week after that.

Here we are again, another year has passed. The end of the session is approaching, and the senior citizens in this country still do not have any way to even get a fair price on prescription medicine. They do not have a Medicare prescription drug plan, and we can do that. We know how to do it. We can figure out how to pay for it. Like I said, it is not complicated.

Makes me think of a fellow I grew up around who used to get aggravated, used to say it would make him want a dip of snuff. That is how it affects me. Makes me want a dip of snuff. I cannot believe that all the good people in this House that serve their constituents, and they do it with a dedication and determination and in an honorable way, are willing to let another year pass and let the prescription drug companies of this country continue to rob the American people over and over again. It just absolutely astounds me, but nothing is happening. Nothing is happening.

The American people pay three times as much for their medicine as any other Nation in the world. Why would we allow that to go on? Why would we let that happen? Why would this House let that happen? Why would this Congress let that happen?

I just heard my good friend from Maine refer to the last presidential campaign, and the President himself swore that he would do everything he could, he was going to pass a prescription drug bill, he was going to get some relief for our seniors. We passed a bill, an amendment to the agriculture appropriations bill in December 2000, very late in the session, and it made it possible where the President of the United States, with the stroke of a pen, can allow the American people, not just senior citizens, all Americans to buy their medicines at the world price. That is all he has got to do is say let us do it, and we are still getting robbed.

We are still paying three times as much. Every country in the world gets their medicine cheaper than we do. It is not right, it is not fair, and we can do something about it. We have already passed a law. All we need is for the President to tell the Food and Drug Administration, get it done. Where I come from that is value. We are not interested in folks that have got good excuses. We are interested in folks that get the job done, and that is what this is all about is getting the job done for the American people.

The American people deserve better. We are a better people than this than to let something like this go on and on and on, and I think it is terrible that we are doing that.

In the little town where I live, and it is full of wonderful people, we look after each other. We do not lock the doors or take the keys out of our cars. Somebody has got a little problem, we try to get over there and help them. If we had somebody going around, stealing from senior citizens, taking their money, taking their food, taking advantage of them in any other way, we would do something about it. If nothing else, we would run them out of town. Preferably we would have the law enforcement officials go find them, take them and put them in the State penitentiary and keep them for a while and see if we could not improve their way of making a living.

We are letting that very same thing happen with the prescription drug companies in the United States and the companies that sell products in the United States. We are letting them rob the American people, and we are letting them rob the senior citizens of this country, and it goes on day after day after day, and nobody is willing to do anything about it. The President can do it with the stroke of a pen, and he refuses to do it.

Why, I ask, would anybody sign up on a deal like this? This is corporate greed taken to the most disgusting level I can imagine. Why would we allow giant corporations to make great profits? And I want them to be profitable. They should be profitable. We want them to be successful.

They ran an ad in the Congress Daily this morning, says pray for a miracle, and implied in that ad that generic drugs were bad and that they would never cure any disease. I can tell my colleagues this, no drug will cure a person if they cannot afford to buy it or if they get robbed, if they have to spend all their money for the drug and they cannot buy their food and cannot pay for their place to live and they cannot pay their utility bills because their drug bills are so high and everybody else in the world gets to buy it for a third of that. We better pray for a miracle if we keep letting these drug companies run over us in this country like they are now.

I think it is an absolute, unmitigated, pitiful shame that we stand in this House of Representatives today and there is nobody else here willing to come down here and do the right thing for the American people. That is not the American way. That is not the reason that these members of this House were elected, and it is time that we do something about it.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, reclaiming my time, there are two words that sum up why we cannot get done here what needs to be done. Greed and money together are the answer.

There was an article in the Wall Street Journal on September 16, just a couple of days ago. Let me just read a couple of paragraphs. The title is this: Drug Industry Steps Up Campaign to Boost Image Ahead of Elections. "Here we go again, the pharmaceutical industry will spend millions of dollars on feel-good ads to boost their image before the election, and in the part of what they are doing, of course, not just boosting their own image but supporting Republican candidates." Let me read these two paragraphs.

□ 1730

"More than $8 million has been committed to ads in recent months promoting nearly two dozen House candidates favoring industry-backed legislation and encouraging a Senate vote on the same bill, according to Charles Jarvis, chairman and chief executive of United Seniors Association, which is airing the spots. He acknowledged that most of the costs associated with the effort, including an additional $4 million Internet and direct mail campaign, are supported by a 'general educational grant from PhRMA.' All but a few of the two dozen or so United Seniors ads running this year thank Republican Members of Congress for supporting an industry-backed bill to provide medicine to seniors."

It is money. It is greed. When there is as much money as we have in the pharmaceutical industry, and its obvious willingness to spend unlimited amounts of money on lobbyists, on campaign contributions and on television ads, we have in effect the people's House taken over by one industry group and blocking the steps that need to be taken.

There is an article in the Hill, a local newspaper, and one of the things, and this is a column by Bruce Freed saying basically that the drug industry needs more transparency. On the one hand they will run ads, lobby people in Congress and say it takes $600-800 million to bring a drug to market, but you cannot find in our figures, we will not show you the accounting, we will not give you enough information about our costs to prove what we are saying. He is saying, look, there is so much lack of confidence now in large American corporations because of the way they have handled their accounting that this cannot be believed. The industry really needs more transparency.

One pricing expert that he quotes says that prescription drugs are priced to generate the greatest profit to the companies. That is independent of any historical research and development spending on that product or any other product. That is not news to us, but it might be news to the American people because the industry has been so relentless in trying to say we need these profits, these profits that make us year after year the most profitable industry in the country. We need all of those profits in order to do research and development, but the cold, hard truth is they spend more on marketing than they do on research and in many respects they have become marketing companies.

Find a drug, tweak it a little bit, get a new patent and spend millions in television advertising trying to persuade seniors and others that this particular medication is the one that they absolutely have to have. I have heard from doctors saying that more and more people are coming into their offices saying not what should I do for my condition, but saying I want this particular drug that I have seen on television. This is not a healthy development for our seniors and certainly not for this democracy.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Maine (Mr. ALLEN) makes an outstanding point. When I think of the Republican drug bill that was passed on this House floor a few months ago, and I think of the memos that were being sent around on the other side of the aisle, and basically what they were saying is that the American people are tired of being robbed by the drug companies, they may not know all of the details, but they know that they are being taken advantage of. They also know that the senior citizens are being put into great disadvantage, and some of them thrown into poverty because of the cost of prescription drugs. So just vote for something. Tell people when you go back home, I voted for a prescription drug bill. It does not amount to a hill of beans, but tell them that is what you did. That so-called prescription drug bill that was passed on this floor, and it was a deceitful thing, but what it makes me think of is a little restaurant which I saw in rural Arkansas. There were two restaurants close together in this community. One of them had been offering an all-you-can-eat special, and he was really making life tough on the fellow down the street. So the fellow down the street decided he would be competitive. He put up a sign that said all you can eat for $100.

That is about the way that this prescription drug bill that was passed by the Republicans works. Let us just make them think that they are going to get something, do not worry about the details. Just pass anything, put your name on the board and let us move on. Hope for the best.

What they also do not tell us is that the United States taxpayers pay for the biggest part of the research and development that drug companies do. We want them to do research. Their profits are such that they can do research. There is no problem with that. But everybody ought to know that the American taxpayer pays for the biggest part of it. Why should we give these guys such a special deal? This is absolutely a ridiculous situation.

On the floor of this House just a few weeks ago, we had a very close, highly contentious vote on trade. I believe in trade. I think we ought to trade across borders. The administration came down here and did all of the arm-twisting they could do to get that fast track trade bill passed; but yet when the President himself holds it within his power where the stroke of a pen or instructions from him to the Food and Drug Administration will allow us to fair-trade drugs in this country and get a good price for our people, he refuses to do it. What is good about that? Nothing. This is corporate greed at its most ridiculous level. We should not allow this to go on.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman is really talking about is what we often call reimportation, and that is legislation which has been passed that would allow drugs to be reimported from Canada. Just to give an example, from a recent bus trip up in Maine where a group of seniors went over the border to Canada, got their prescriptions filled by a Canadian physician, 25 people saved $1,600 in one bus trip.

Just to give one example of a critical drug, Tamoxifen is a drug for breast cancer, and many women who are going through a fight against breast cancer do not need to be fighting for their pocketbooks as well. Tamoxifen in Maine costs $112-114 for a month's supply. In Canada, it is about $13. There is a 10-1 differential for Tamoxifen for fighting breast cancer.

When we look at other countries, the prices are much lower elsewhere. Why? Because the governments in those countries do not allow their seniors to be taken advantage of. All of those governments one way or another set some kind of cap on what the pharmaceutical industry can pay.

We have the anomaly here in the United States, Medicare, 39 million beneficiaries, the largest health care plan in the United States, they do not have prescription drug coverage, they do not have the Federal Government negotiating lower prices for them. They are on their own.

For those of us who are still working and have some sort of health insurance, we get our prescription drug coverage through our health insurer. No matter who our health insurer is, that insurer is negotiating with the pharmaceutical companies to get a reduced price. How much, we do not always know, but they are getting a reduced price from the pharmaceutical industry. It is a scandal that seniors cannot get the best price in the country. They are part of the largest group. They use the most medications. We ought to have the kind of leverage over price that will give seniors the price that they are leveraged, that their marketing position deserves. But when it comes to developing a Medicare prescription drug plan of any kind down here in the Congress, the first rule is do no harm to the pharmaceutical industry's profits.

So we have seniors dying, not getting the care they want. We have seniors who cannot afford food and paying the rent simply because their prescription drug costs are too high. They simply cannot do it, and the result is that they are in trouble. But the instinct of many down here who receive corporate campaign contributions from the industry is protect the industry first.

We are a long way of being done from campaign contributions in this particular election cycle, but so far, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, nearly $16 million has been donated to political candidates and parties during this election cycle, 2001-2002, by the pharmaceutical industry, 74 percent of it so far to Republicans. If Members wonder why we are not getting this job done, that is the reason.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. BERRY) to explain this particular chart.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, this is a copy of an ad that was run in Congress Daily this morning. It is an attempt to convince Members to do everything they can to discourage generic drug use and to help the pharmaceutical manufacturers in this country continue to be able to overcharge and rob the American people.

At first glance Members can see it has, of course, the words at the top, Pray for a Miracle. That is one thing in this ad that I agree with. I think that we should, indeed, pray for a miracle because I think that is what it will take on the floor of this House and in this Congress and with this administration to achieve a situation that will allow us to let the American people buy their medicine at a fair price and to make sure that the senior citizens of this country have the necessary medicine that they need to stay healthy, have a decent lifestyle, and to not have to go to bed hungry at night because they had to spend all of their money on medicine and could not afford to buy any food. That is an idea that I think the American people will be ashamed of. We are a better country than that. We are a better people than that, and we are a better Congress than that because we represent good people.

It is time, and I say that over and over again, I say it because I believe it, it is time for this Congress to present to this administration the opportunity to do the right thing, to do the right thing and let the American people get a fair deal when they buy their medicine, to let our senior citizens have the same opportunity to have a fulfilling life and not get robbed when they have to go buy their medicine.

I also want to make one point in a very strong way. We need to recognize the community pharmacies in this country. These people have to pay these exorbitant prices, make almost no profit, scramble like crazy to try to stay in business, and sell their products to their customers as cheap as they can, and they do heroic work trying to provide this expensive medicine at the lowest possible price to our senior citizens, and I think they need to be recognized for the great work that they do.

□ 1745

I thank the gentleman for his comments. I might call attention again to that advertisement. It says, "Pray for a miracle because generic drugs will never cure him." It is an ad run by PhRMA, the pharmaceutical industry association or the association for the brand-name prescription drugs.

The reason that ad is being run right now is that the Senate has passed a bill, basically, to encourage more competition and, therefore, lower prices between the generic industry and the brand-name pharmaceutical industry. A lot of important drugs have gone off-patent lately and some more are to follow and the generic companies are providing exactly the same medication, exactly the same medication; but typically once they are in the market, once they are able to compete, the price of the brand-name drops precipitously and prescription drugs go down.

We have the same kind of bill, bipartisan bill, that is here in the House. It is called the Prescription Drug Fair Competition Act, H.R. 5272. But the Republican majority, the Republican leadership is not willing to bring this to the floor. On the Democratic side of the aisle, we are going to start a discharge petition to bring this bill to the floor, to see if we can get enough signatures so we can actually have a vote to do what the Senate did.

Let me just say a couple of things. In recent years, the brand-name companies have really been gaming the whole patent system to keep generics off the market for months and even years beyond the time that it was intended by Congress when it passed legislation in 1984. The bill that we are going to try to get to the floor on the Democratic side here is intended to prevent abuses of the existing law and allow competitive generic drugs to reach the marketplace more quickly. The Congressional Budget Office has looked at this bill and has estimated that this bill, the Prescription Drug Fair Competition Act, would reduce total spending on prescription drugs by $60 billion, or 1.3 percent, over the next 10 years. That does not include the enormous savings that would accrue if a Medicare prescription drug benefit is enacted.

There have been so many ways that the brand-name pharmaceutical industry has really lifted the cost of prescription drugs. When there is a patent lawsuit going on, and it is easy to get a patent lawsuit going on, then they have been able to basically get repeated delays so that the FDA is not able to approve a generic application for sometimes 30 months; and sometimes they can stack these 30-month periods one after the other and make the delays run for years. This is a bill that would provide early resolution of some patent disputes. It would also prevent these collusive agreements that sometimes the brand-name companies have paid generic companies not to bring a competing drug to market. The result of that is the generic company gets some money, the pharmaceutical company, the brand-name pharmaceutical is able to charge much higher prices for an additional 6 months or longer, and the only people who are really seriously harmed are the consumers, the public.

This legislation would prevent that from happening. This is good legislation. There is some Republican support for this bill. It ought to be something we could do following the lead of the other body. We ought to be able to do this, but right now we are sitting here not doing anything on appropriations bills.

I told people back home during the August recess that when we came back in September we were going to be very busy because we had only passed five of 13 appropriations bills and we would be working hard on that. We are now almost at the end of our third week since we came back, and we have not seen a sign of an appropriations bill anywhere in this Chamber. They are not about to bring up any of the appropriations bills, it looks like. So we are not doing the work we were sent here to do. We are not helping our seniors with prescription drugs. It is a sorry state of affairs. A large part of the reason has to be that the pharmaceutical industry, at least with respect to prescription drugs, a large part of the reason is so much money is being spent on lobbying, on campaign contributions and on ads.

You cannot watch television without seeing ads from the pharmaceutical industry. Now they will not just be feel-good ads with people running through fields of clover, but they will be ads touting particular candidates; and you can be quite sure that if they are praising a candidate, it is probably a Republican in most cases and if they are attacking a candidate, it is probably a Democrat in almost all cases. As a result, the people's will, what people over and over again want in Arkansas and Maine and around this country, a Medicare prescription drug benefit, a discount on their prescription drugs, the right to get medicines from Canada or other countries with lower rates, all of these approaches are being stymied and the will of the people in this country is being frustrated by a majority that is locked into the pharmaceutical industry and doing the bidding of the pharmaceutical industry. It is a national scandal.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine is absolutely right. It is a national scandal. A few months ago, we had these corporate scandals. We were having, it seemed like, one or two a week. We had corporations that had been caught not telling the truth. Apparently we had corporations that had some executives that might have even taken money that did not belong to them. We found out all of a sudden that these companies did not have the assets they said they had. They were not worth what they said they were worth. They could not do what they said they could do.

We just rushed to the floor of this House, we could not get here quick enough, and passed a law that said we are going to punish them some more. And we should have. They deserve to be punished. Every day now you pick up the paper and you see another corporate executive is being charged by the Department of Justice for breaking the law and they are making him a criminal. If they broke the law, they deserve to be treated as criminals, and they deserve whatever comes to them. That is for the law to decide.

But for the prescription drug manufacturers in this country and those that sell their products in this country to continue to rob and cheat the senior citizens of this country should be against the law. It should not be allowed. It is just as wrong as those corporate executives that betrayed their stockholders and betrayed their employees and betrayed people that invested in their companies. It is just as criminal for these drug companies to cheat and take advantage of and rob our senior citizens and the sick people of this country and the working people of this country that cannot do anything about it. This is just as wrong as these corporate scandals that we have. And we rushed to this floor. You could hardly stop folks from coming down here and talking about how bad it was and what a terrible thing. And it was. But these folks are stealing more money than all of those companies stole or misappropriated or misused or lied about or whatever it is they did.

What the drug companies steal from the senior citizens of this country on a daily basis is absolutely overwhelming. The $16 million that they spend on campaigns, that is not even walking-around money. That is not even soda pop money for these folks. Yet they are doing it day after day after day.

I believe the gentleman from Maine referred to the idea that the drug companies had decided they needed to improve their image. Boy, you are right about that. If there is anybody in this country that ought to improve their image, it would be the prescription drug manufacturers. They have got a sorry image, as far as I am concerned. I will say once again, America is better than this. The American people are better than this. This Congress is better than this, than to let it keep going on and on.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the gentleman for his comments. I will make just one final comment. We have been talking a lot about prescription drugs for seniors this evening and what a serious problem it is for Medicare beneficiaries because they do not have a Medicare prescription drug benefit at all. But back home in Maine what we are finding is that the small business community is now getting hit by very steep increases in their health insurance premiums. Small business men and women in my State are seeing health insurance premium increases of 30 percent, 40 percent, sometimes 50 percent; and this is the third successive year in which that is happening. The viability of many small businesses in Maine is really being threatened by rapidly rising prescription drug costs because that is the major component that is driving up their health insurance premiums.

This is a big and complicated issue. The fairness of our health care system, the ability of people to get access to the health care they need is a national issue of enormous importance, and it is one that is being neglected in this House because we are paying far too much attention to the industry itself and not to the people. I want to thank the gentleman from Arkansas for participating in this Special Order tonight.

TARIFF ON STEEL IMPORTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PUTNAM). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SMITH) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the majority leader.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am going to make some comments on the tariff on steel imports. Several companies in my congressional district, the Seventh Congressional District of Michigan, which is roughly the bottom center of Michigan, have come to me as steel users and said that they have got a huge problem. The steel suppliers are saying, We don't care about the contract. We're going to increase the cost of the steel and you have to pay us double what the contract was. The company says, Well, we can go to court. The steel suppliers say, Well, you can do that. We'll probably fight it in court for 3 years, but tomorrow we're not going to deliver the steel that you need to meet your contracts.

What is the solution? President Bush approved the new tariffs on steel imports, I think, to help give the steel industry and our American steelworkers really a chance to make changes so they might compete in the long term. I suspect the President, who as a young man did the hard physical work in the oil fields, wanted to give a chance to save some of the jobs of the people that do the hard physical work in the steel industry. However, the high tariff restrictions on steel imports have turned out to be a mistake with a potential of losing more jobs than they save.

The price of steel in the United States has risen since last March by 30 to 50 percent. In addition to the large price increases, there has been a reduction in the amount of steel available because of the reduced imports coming in. This has made it impossible for many steel-consuming industries to find the steel that they need on the one hand and they are obligated to pay this new higher price that means that in many cases they are actually losing money filling their particular contracts. Domestic steel producers have in many cases reneged on the long-term contracts now that the steel prices have leaped, with the result that the consuming industries have been forced to pay that higher price than the agreed-on prices or have been forced into the volatile spot market for steel.

The President's action, I think, turns against what he said on free trade and on taxes. First, by definition, free trade implies that it is unencumbered by demands of third parties. When government imposes tariffs on products, it reduces the ease with which they come across borders, either way, back and forth. Second, tariffs are just taxes by another name. Steel tariffs raise the cost of buying products that contain steel, cars, refrigerators, for instance, just as raising the sales tax on those products would. So it means not only are they in trouble, but once they produce the goods to the extent that they are able to pass that increased price on, American consumers pay the cost of that higher tax or tariff.

□ 1800

The new Bush tariff is expected to hike the cost of steel products by 6 to 8 percent in the first 12 months, and in our State of Michigan, Michigan citizens will be hit hardest.

Here is why: One of the most basic propositions of economics is the inverse relationship between price and quantity demanded. When the price of some goods, steel in this case, rises, less of it is going to be demanded, and the result is fewer sales of products containing steel and fewer jobs are going to be available for those industries that use that steel, the steel user industry that are ultimately making those finished goods with steel.

This harms the Michigan workers and it harms the American workers in a number of ways. First, some American producers lose out because they are now competing with foreign companies that have access to cheaper steel. So I have got some companies in my district that say, well, we are considering moving to Mexico, Canada or someplace else, because they are paying a much lower price for steel. They are paying the world market price, where here in the United States, because we restrict the availability of steel and held out, the competition, the foreign competition, if you will, are paying a much higher price. Their products then become relatively more expensive because the steel in them costs our American producers more.

Second, many American firms have simply had trouble securing sufficient supplies of steel in quantities to keep the factory operating. I have had layoffs in my district because plants have closed for the lack of steel.

The third point I would make: It gives American firms, I think, a powerful incentive to move production out of the United States to foreign plants where steel is available at the lower world market price. This is so they can compete and can survive as a company. So it is hard to blame them, if that is their only recourse to survive.

So that is what we are being threatened with in Michigan, some of these companies moving out of the State, and that is what is happening in many other areas of the United States where steel users are faced with a problem.

A couple of economists, Joseph Francois and Laura Baughman, working on behalf of the Consuming Industries Trade Action Coalition, have estimated the impact of the Bush tariffs on the American economy in terms of their economic benefits and costs. For instance, they found that every State in the Union will suffer net job losses as a result of the tariffs. Ironically, the biggest job losses will occur in the Steel Belt, states such as Pennsylvania, such as Michigan. For every steel job saved as a result of the tariff, eight jobs will be lost in all sectors of the economy.

Another point: The steel-producing industry would save between 4,400 and 4,800 jobs at a cost of about $439,500 to $451,000 per steel job saved. Higher prices for steel products and related inefficiencies would decrease U.S. national income someplace around $500 million, at a time when policymakers are talking about ways to improve the U.S. economy.

Again, back in my State of Michigan, Michigan will suffer from the negative consequences of tariffs, and these economists found that Michigan will lose more jobs in steel-related industries than every State in the Union, save California. Under the most conservative scenario, Mr. Speaker, Michigan will lose almost five jobs in steel-consuming industries for every one job that is saved in Michigan steel-producing industries.

Here is the point: There are 57 workers employed in the steel-using companies, 57 workers employed in the steel-using companies, for every one worker that is employed in the steel-making industry. Steel-using industries account for more than 13 percent of gross domestic product. Steel-using industries account for more than 13 percent of GDP, where the steel industry accounts for only about one-half of 1 percent of GDP. So the result, thus, the steel tariff has threatened many more jobs than it has protected.

The Bush administration, I think, has recognized some of the distress that the steel tariffs are causing, so it has issued rulings that exclude 727 products from the tariff. Of course, this has set off a frenzy of lobbying as some of the steel-using companies angle for exemptions. That is what is happening now. This causes distortions not only in the cost of foreign and domestic producers, but also in Michigan and the United States between competing domestic producers as well.

The timing of the decision to impose the tariff is also a problem. Steel imports into the United States have been declining. Steel imports, after reaching a high of 4 million tons in August of 1998, had declined by 36 percent to 2.6 million tons in November of 2001. Moreover, the market share of foreign steel producers has fallen from 28 percent in 1998 to 21 percent in 2001. This made the imposition of the tariff less pressing, and maybe we could have gone along without it.

The challenge has got to be on the steel industry, and I think on government as well, as we look at how can we help this industry without hurting so many other workers and so many other industries that are steel users.

It has been argued that the real threat to most of the domestic steel industry is not foreign steel at all. Steel is manufactured in the United States at mini-mills and integrated steel mills. It is the integrated mills that are having the greatest difficulty in making a profit right now.

Mini-mills are much more efficient at producing steel than the integrated steel mill and have a 25 percent cost advantage over producing steel than the integrated mills do. As a result of their cost advantage, mini-mills have increased their market share from 10 percent in the 1970s to about 50 percent today. Over the same time period, the share of imports in the United States market has increased by only 10 percent. Therefore, the real threat to the integrated steel mills are not imports, but our own American mini-mills.

Finally, the steel tariff encourages retaliation from our trading partners. If you look at the European Commission, it is now threatening retaliatory tariffs of 100 percent on a 22-page list of goods ranging from rice to grapefruit to shoes to brassieres to nuts to bib overalls to billiard tables to ballpoint pens, and the list goes on. So retaliation could develop into the kind of price war that is going to hurt the United States a great deal.

The Japanese, for example, are also drawing up their steel payback list. Steel-exporting Russia, looking for ways to retaliate, has said we are going to fence out the U.S. chickens that are coming into Russia. Even though Russia does not produce chickens, they need the chickens, but they are looking for ways to retaliate. Hopefully that issue is going to be resolved.

Mr. Speaker, we can ask if the tariff has done that much for the steel industry. I would mention that I was going to mention that Florida is a significant steel-using state, but I see our Speaker has changed. But I will mention that steel-using industries are all over the United States.

Over the past 30 years, the Federal Government has been implementing policies to keep the steel industry in business, despite its inefficiencies. These policies have included voluntary quotas and antidumping, and that is the thing that has got to continue. If some other country is dumping below the cost of production, then we are going to stop that kind of dumping. So that is going to take place and should take place, regardless of whether we lift the current restrictions on imports.

The countervailing duty measures are another. Some of the companies have moved up and are now competitive, but much of the industry, instead of resulting in a stronger manufacturing efficiency, these policies are allowing companies to continue with production methods, with labor contracts, that keep it perpetually at the risk of dissolution and keep it out of reach of real competition with other mills in the United States and the international steel producers.

Standard and Poor, for example, was not optimistic when the President announced the tariff restrictions on steel imports, and they responded to the tariffs by refusing to raise the industry's credit rating.

The steel tariff has turned out to be a mistake that is harming many industries, both in my State of Michigan and across the country. It is having the result of losing American jobs.

We need to repeal this kind of tariff restriction to allow our steel-using companies to again be competitive and keep those companies in the United States. We need to start reviewing the kind of overzealous regulations and overzealous taxation that we put on the steel industry. So let us look at the tax imposition that we put on our steel manufacturing industries compared to what other countries are doing with their steel manufacturing industries.

We need to assist, I think, in research and technology. I am chair of the Subcommittee on Research in the Committee on Science. So we need to continue making sure that our research and our technology is available, and we can look at ways of expanding the technologies that are applicable to that industry to help allow these steel-producing industries to be more competitive in the international market. There are a lot of things we can do without challenging and disrupting the many workers in America that are working in the steel-using industry.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to also make a couple comments on our spending and our budget.

Right now we have got a challenge of where do we go on spending. We are in a war. We are going to be required to make sure that, to the greatest extent possible, we assure the safety of American citizens. We are probably going to waste a lot of effort, a lot of talent, a lot of money, and, in some cases, go further than we really would have needed to go in terms of protecting ourselves against terrorists. But the challenge, of course, for Members of Congress and for the President is making sure that we go far enough in our protections to have the greatest assurance possible.

As we spend a tremendous amount of money in our war against terror, and that is approaching $90 billion now, I think we have got to remind ourselves that we are in a war and that some of the other traditional spending, some of the maybe less important spending, needs to be held only to a modest increase.

Nobody is suggesting a cut in how we spend money, but we are suggesting that we hold the line and we hold tight to the President's budget suggestions so that discretionary spending is not going to continue to spiral, if you will, out of control.

The 10-year spending history on discretionary spending has gone from a little over $500 billion to approaching someplace between $758 billion, is what the President has suggested for discretionary spending, compared to the Senate is now looking at $770 billion for discretionary spending.

We hear some people suggest, "Well, boy, you should not have had that tax cut. The tax cut is really what has caused all this problem in terms of the budget so that we do not have all this extra money." Let me just point out that the tax cut represents only 13 percent of the problem of overspending.

We are looking at overspending this year that is going to approach $150 billion. Not good. We recently increased the debt limit; and I think when we do that, we need to make sure that someplace down the road we are going to be able to say to our kids and our grandkids that we are going to start paying this debt down again.

We have paid about $500 billion down on the debt held by the public over the last half a dozen years. I mean, that is good news. That was good. We said we were not going to spend the surplus coming in from Social Security; but now, with the war on terror, we started spending the surplus on Social Security again, and we have increased the allowable debt limit of this country. And it should be just somehow a strong message from every fiscally responsible individual in Congress and around the United States to say, hey, look, we are in a war, it is time that we held the line on increased spending in other areas.

Let me give my colleagues some quick examples. We have 13 appropriations bills that handle the discretionary spending. The Labor-HHS-Education bill, under the House plan, spending would grow 60.5 percent since 1998. That is almost between five and six times the inflation rate. So with the problem of a tremendously progressive tax system, we are in a situation where, according to the Heritage Foundation, over 50 percent of the benefits from Federal spending go to individuals who collectively pay less than 1 percent of the income tax. So the old safeguard, if you are going to have more government spending, somebody has to pay for it, we have to now in our collective efforts divide the wealth and try to make sure that there is some good distribution, to make sure that people are not going to go hungry and have a home, and our welfare systems and our food systems and, at the same time, reducing the amount of tax that low-income people pay. We have redistributed wealth to the extent where most, the top 10 percent of taxpayers, pay approximately 90 percent of the total income taxes in this country.

As we look at the challenges of where we go on spending, there are a lot of people in everybody's district that say, well, we would like you to spend a little more on this program or that program; and quite often, these individuals, and that represents maybe 50 percent of the constituency of many of us in Congress, are looking at a situation where it does not cost them very much in their income taxes, so their willingness to call for increased spending is at little or no cost to themselves.

We have had a system from the founders of our country, and it was interesting that we went up to New York, the first time this Congress left session in Washington, D.C. in over 200 years and went to the Federal building up in New York where George Washington was first sworn in and where, in 1789, the first Congress presided and we passed the Bill of Rights. We have had a country that sort of has the motivation, the incentive that those that learn, that try, that save and invest end up better off than those that do not. I mean, that has been our motivation. As we keep trying to divide the wealth, where we lose that kind of motivation, we are going to lose some of the incentives that have caused such a great success, I think, in the American economy over the 226-odd years that we have been in existence.

Let me briefly look at some of the other increases in spending, and these dramatic increases in spending have even been during a Republican majority for many of these years. The Interior spending, we are now looking at spending that is going to be 40 percent higher than 1998, or about a 7.1 percent average. So that is maybe 2½ times the rate of inflation that we have grown in the Interior spending. The Treasury and Postal spending has gone up 41 percent since 1998, an average of 7.2 percent per year increase in spending, much higher than inflation.

I have another chart here, this is a so-called spending history; and discretionary spending growth will average at least 7.5 percent each year since we balanced the budget in 1998. So you see, since 1998 we have just really taken off. What we did was we balanced the budget, we said it is important to balance the budget, and then we have sort of extra money, so everybody came up with ideas of how we could spend that extra money.

What it means is that it is going to be more difficult to face the challenges of a good Medicare program, a good Medicaid program, a solvent Social Security plan. I think it should be another incentive to this body and the body on the other side and the President to hold the line on less important spending as we face the war on terrorism.

Veterans Affairs, HUD, International, it has grown 39 percent since 1998, an 8 percent increase per year. Commerce, Justice and State also has grown with an average of 29 percent, 29 percent since 1998. Defense, not including our extra money that we have spent on terror, has gone up 46 percent, almost four times the rate of inflation. Transportation, it has increased by 52 percent since 1998, 9 percent average per year increase. Agriculture has gone up 21 percent since 1998.

My point is that we are spending a lot of money, and are we doing a proper job of prioritizing that spending? In some areas I think we are, because for example, we have had a 132 percent increase in education spending since 1996. In Health and Human Services, almost a 100 percent increase; in December, a 48 percent increase that does not include the extra money since last September 11, a year ago.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I call on my colleagues, I call on the President to hold the line on spending and resist some of the pressures coming in from all of these special interest lobbyists that are giving millions of dollars toward campaigns for this election on November 5, saying we want more money for our constituency, for our particular clients. And so often, a Member of Congress, when they come up with more spending and new programs, they end up back home cutting a ribbon on some project they have taken back to their district, they get on television and in the newspaper. So the tendency has been for a Member of Congress to increase their chances of being reelected if they spend more money and take more pork barrel projects home to their particular district.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is going to take the President, number one, and it is going to take the American people, number two, to say, look, now is the time to hold the line on spending.

THE CASE FOR PEACE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PUTNAM). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to address the House of Representatives. I would first like to say that in this next hour, I and several of my colleagues will discuss the issue which is uppermost in the minds of the American people, the issue of war and peace, the issue of whether our sons and daughters are going to be sent to a distant land to fight in a war which the American people really have not had a chance to talk about in their own communities. So tonight we are going to make the case as to why the United States should not go to war against Iraq. We are going to talk about the various elements which are motivating this effort to go to war against Iraq; and finally, we are going to talk about what people can do who are concerned about what appears to be this effort that has almost seemingly unstoppable momentum towards a war, because this still is the government of the people. That is the beauty of this wonderful forum we are in, the House of Representatives, and we are going to this evening have an opportunity to show how a government of the people works, not only here, but how it works back in the communities which we represent.

So as we begin our discussion, I want to recognize my colleague, the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR), who has been a fearless defender of the rights of working people, a defender of the highest principles this country stands for, and someone who is respected and admired across this Nation. I want to thank the gentlewoman for participating in this 1-hour, and at this time I yield to her.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the able gentleman from Cleveland, Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH), for bringing us together and exhibiting the leadership role that he has, both within the Congress and outside in our country, in attempting to deliver the messages to the American people that they need to hear about decision-making here in Washington on the important issues of war and peace, and how it affects them in their families, in their communities, and, obviously, in our country.

I know there will be many other Members who will speak, and I want to thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH) for also appearing on programs like "Crossfire" and trying to get out the message to the American people, which largely is being blocked here in Washington because of the way we are functioning as a Congress. Here it is the middle of the week, we have had a few votes today, we could not say any of them were very earthshaking, and now votes have been canceled next Monday and Friday. We will not be here this Friday, we were not here this Monday, and our floor time is extraordinarily limited. So it has been very difficult to talk to the American people about this continuing drumbeat toward war because essentially, our institutions and our ability to function as a lawmaking body have been heavily proscribed by the Republican leadership in this Chamber, and it has been hard to get the word out.

I would say that no gentleman has worked harder than the gentleman from Cleveland, Ohio, to talk to the American people and to present the information that is very important. I know this will be an exchange tonight, and we will go back and forth; but it is probably important to put in some context what happened about one year ago, 9-11, 2001 when 17 individuals, international criminals from Saudi Arabia, 17 of 19 created carnage in our country in New York, over Pennsylvania, and here in Washington, from the al Qaeda network, which is a Middle Eastern terrorist network.

Their supposed leader, Osama bin Laden, made the statement at that time that these crimes were being committed against the American people because he wanted Western infidels out of Saudi Arabia. Iraq was not even on the table. Iraq is not an issue. Our major confrontation has been with al Qaeda; and, of course, they took refuge inside of Afghanistan, and so all of us have troops from our districts currently deployed, Navy, Army, Air Force, and Marines, in that region of the world and here at home protecting the American people and defending our freedom. But it is important to remind ourselves that the enemy we are fighting is the terrorist network of al Qaeda. The President came down here to the floor of Congress and said that.

I think it is also important to point out that al Qaeda is an Islamic fundamentalist network. In other words, it is very religious. They have a sacred rage that has turned their views highly political and highly dangerous into the international realm, and they do not have a presence in Iraq, because Iraq is a secular state.

Al Qaeda has not been known to use Iraq as its base. So there is a disconnect between the policies that we are pursuing in order to bring to justice those who have done so much harm globally through al Qaeda, and also there has been an ignorance of Saudi Arabia's role in permitting the Saudis to operate inside Saudi Arabia and then promoting madrassahs outside of Saudi Arabia as well, producing hate-filled young boys who ultimately become terrorists in years hence in places like Pakistan and Afghanistan, in Malaysia, indeed around the world.

So I wanted to just place on the record as we begin who the enemy is in terms of September 11 and subsequently, and all of a sudden emerging then through this summer we begin to hear about war with Iraq, and we ask ourselves the questions and we have gone to all the security briefings here on the Hill, what is the connection?

What has Iraq done in the last 4 months different than the prior 4 years? What is anticipated over the next 4 months or 8 months or 1 year different than what happened over the last 5 or 10 years? And no evidence. We have been presented with no photographs, with no intelligence information to give us any connection between what has happened relative to al Qaeda and the enemy we are fighting and Iraq, and yet there is this tremendous drumbeat toward going to war with Iraq.

The President said at the United Nations last week, and I am very thankful that President Bush went to the United Nations because we still have been engaged as one of 189 nations in the world, the international community, he said that Iraq presented a grave and gathering threat. Not an imminent threat, a grave and gathering threat to the world. So those words I listened to very carefully. I asked myself what is really going on here?

I also want to place on the record tonight an article that was in the Washington Post on Sunday entitled An Iraqi War Scenario, Oil Is Key Issue. I think it is important for the American people to know that even though technically the President wants to go to war with Iraq, today 8 percent of the oil we consume here in the United States is from Iraq. That may sound like a paradox. After Saudi Arabia, Iraq presents the largest oil fields in the world and in fact has proven reserves of 112 billion barrels of crude oil. This article talks about the reshuffling of the world petroleum markets related to any change of regime in Iraq, and I think it is important to follow the business pages which today showed that with the possibility of Iraq's regime changing, oil prices in the world were beginning to actually drop because, as this article states, five permanent members of the Security Council, the United States, Britain, France, Russia, and China, have international oil companies with major stakes in a change of leadership in Bagdad; and without question, it says, the United States would almost certainly be the dominant foreign power in Iraq after the aftermath of Saddam Hussein's fall.

The leader of a group called the Iraqi National Congress, based in London, an umbrella organization of opposition groups backed by our country, among others, the leader of that group, Ahmed Chalabi, says that American oil companies would have a big shot at Iraqi oil. I think it is really important for the American people to distinguish between our war with the al Qaeda terrorist network and Islamic fundamentalist network, with no real home country but with deep roots in Saudi Arabia, and Iraq, which actually had been an ally of the United States prior to the Persian Gulf war, and we should be insisting as a country on the evidence for any invasion.

I know that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH) would like to add to what I have said and I again thank him so much for his international leadership on this important question.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 15, 2002]

IN IRAQI WAR SCENARIO, OIL IS KEY ISSUE

(By Dan Morgan and David B. Ottaway)

A U.S.-led ouster of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein could open a bonanza for American oil companies long banished from Iraq, scuttling oil deals between Baghdad and Russia, France and other countries, and reshuffling world petroleum markets, according to industry officials and leaders of the Iraqi opposition.

Although senior Bush administration officials say they have not begun to focus on the issues involving oil and Iraq, American and foreign oil companies have already begun maneuvering for a stake in the country's huge proven reserves of 112 billion barrels of crude oil, the largest in the world outside Saudi Arabia.

The importance of Iraq's oil has made it potentially one of the administration's biggest bargaining chips in negotiations to win backing from the U.N. Security Council and Western allies for President Bush's call for tough international action against Hussein. All five permanent members of the Security Council—the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China—have international oil companies with major stakes in a change of leadership in Baghdad.

"It's pretty straightforward," said former CIA director R. James Woolsey, who has been one of the leading advocates of forcing Hussein from power. "France and Russia have oil companies and interests in Iraq. They should be told that if they are of assistance in moving Iraq toward decent government, we'll do the best we can to ensure that the new government and American companies work closely with them."

But he added: "If they throw in their lot with Saddam, it will be difficult to the point of impossible to persuade the new Iraqi government to work with them."

Indeed, the mere prospect of a new Iraqi government has fanned concerns by non-American oil companies that they will be excluded by the United States, which almost certainly would be the dominant foreign power in Iraq in the aftermath of Hussein's fall. Representatives of many foreign oil concerns have been meeting with leaders of the Iraqi opposition to make their case for a future stake and to sound them out about their intentions.

Since the Persian Gulf War in 1991, companies from more than a dozen nations, including France, Russia, China, India, Italy, Vietnam and Algeria, have either reached or sought to reach agreements in principle to develop Iraqi oil fields, refurbish existing facilities or explore undeveloped tracts. Most of the deals are on hold until the lifting of U.N. sanctions.

But Iraqi opposition officials made clear in interviews last week that they will not be bound by any of the deals.

"We will review all these agreements, definitely," said Faisal Qaragholi, a petroleum engineer who directs the London office of the Iraqi National Congress (INC), an umbrella organization of opposition groups that is backed by the United States. "Our oil policies should be decided by a government in Iraq elected by the people."

Ahmed Chalabi, the INC leader, went even further, saying he favored the creation of a U.S.-led consortium to develop Iraq's oil fields, which have deteriorated under more than a decade of sanctions. "American companies will have a big shot at Iraqi oil," Chalabi said.

The INC, however, said it has not taken a formal position on the structure of Iraq's oil industry in event of a change of leadership.

While the Bush Administration's campaign against Hussein is presenting vast possibilities for multinational oil giants, it poses major risks and uncertainties for the global oil markets, according to industry analysts.

Access to Iraqi oil and profits will depend on the nature and intentions of a new government. Whether Iraq remains a member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, for example, or seeks an independent role, free of the OPEC cartel's quotas, will have an impact on oil prices and the flow of investments to competitors such as Russia, Venezuela and Angola.

While Russian oil companies such as Lukoil have a major financial interest in developing Iraqi fields, the low prices that could result from a flood of Iraqi oil into world markets could set back Russian government efforts to attract foreign investment in its untapped domestic fields. That is because low world oil prices could make costly ventures to unlock Siberia's oil treasures far less appealing.

Bush and Vice President Cheney have worked in the oil business and have longstanding ties to the industry. But despite the buzz about the future of Iraqi oil among oil companies, the administration, preoccupied with military planning and making the case about Hussein's potential threat, has yet to take up the issue in a substantive way, according to U.S. officials.

The Future of Iraq Group, a task force set up at the State Department, does not have oil on its list of issues, a department spokesman said last week. An official with the National Security Council declined to say whether oil had been discussed during consultations on Iraq that Bush had had over the past several weeks with Russian President Vladimir Putin and Western leaders.

On Friday, a State Department delegation concluded a three-day visit to Moscow in connection with Iraq. In early October, U.S. and Russian officials are to hold an energy summit in Houston at which more than 100 Russian and American energy companies are expected.

Rep. Curt Weldon (R-PA) said Bush is keenly aware of Russia's economic interests in Iraq, stemming from a $7 billion to $8 billion debt that Iraq ran up with Moscow before the Gulf War. Weldon, who has cultivated close ties to Putin and Russian parliamentarians, said he believed the Russian leader will support U.S. action in Iraq if he can get private assurances from Bush that Russia "will be made whole" financially.

Officials of the Iraqi National Congress said last week that the INC's Washington director, Entifadh K. Qanbar, met with Russian Embassy officials here last month and urged Moscow to begin a dialogue with opponents of Hussein's government.

But even with such groundwork, the chances of a tidy transition in the oil sector appear highly problematic. Rival ethnic groups in Iraq's north are already squabbling over the giant Kirkuk oil field, which Arabs, Kurds and minority Turkmen tribesmen are eyeing in the event of Hussein's fall.

Although the volumes have dwindled in recent months, the United States was importing nearly 1 million barrels of Iraqi oil a day at the start of the year. Even so, American oil companies have been banished from direct involvement in Iraq since the late 1980s, when relations soured between Washington and Baghdad.

Hussein in the 1990s turned to non-American companies to repair fields damaged in the Gulf War and Iraq's earlier war against Iran, and to tap undeveloped reserves, but U.S. government studies say the results have been disappointment.

While Russia's Lukoil negotiated a $4 billion deal in 1997 to develop the 15-billion-barrel West Qurna field in southern Iraq, Lukoil had not commenced work because of U.N. sanctions. Iraq has threatened to void the agreement unless work began immediately.

Last October, the Russian oil services company Slavneft reportedly signed a $52 million service contract to drill at the Tuba field, also in southern Iraq. A proposed $40 billion Iraqi-Russian economic agreement also reportedly includes opportunities for Russian companies to explore for oil in Iraq's western desert.

The French company Total Fina Elf has negotiated for rights to develop the huge Majnoon field, near the Iranian border, which may contain up to 30 billion barrels of oil. But in July 2001, Iraq announced it would no longer give French firms priority in the award of such contracts because of its decision to abide by the sanctions.

Officials of several major firms said they were taking care to avoid playing any role in the debate in Washington over how to proceed on Iraq. "There's no real upside for American oil companies to take a very aggressive stance at this stage. There'll be plenty of time in the future," said James Lucier, an oil analyst with Prudential Securities.

But with the end of sanctions that likely would come with Hussein's ouster, companies such as ExxonMobil and ChevronTexaco would almost assuredly play a role, industry officials said. "There's not an oil company out there that wouldn't be interested in Iraq," one analyst said.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR) and again repeat what an honor it is to serve with her in this House and I thank her for enabling me to be in this House because she assisted in that effort.

Mr. Speaker, I want to raise this question, and that is why is war with Iraq being presented as inevitable? Is it not time to insist that our leaders suspect this incessant talk of preemptive war, of assumed right to unilateral action, and is it not time for insistence upon preventative diplomacy and our obligations to work with the world community on matters of global security? Why is this war being presented as inevitable?

The headlines from the New York Times of September 12, 2002, read: Bush to Warn UN, Act on Iraq or U.S. Will. He Leads Nation in Mourning at Terror Sites. Mr. Speaker, there is no credible evidence linking Iraq with 9-11. There is no evidence linking Iraq with al Qaeda. There is no evidence linking Iraq with the anthrax attacks on this Nation. There is no credible evidence that Iraq has usable weapons of mass destruction, the ability to deliver those weapons or the intention to do so. When Iraq used such weapons, sad to say, they did it with the knowledge and sometimes with materials from the United States.

During the administration of Ronald Reagan, 60 helicopters were sold to Iraq. Later reports said Iraq used U.S. helicopters to spray Kurds with chemical weapons. We have heard about that. We have heard about the Kurds being attacked by Iraq with chemical weapons, but what we have not heard is that U.S. helicopters were used.

According to the Washington Post, Iraq used mustard gas against Iran with the help of intelligence from the CIA. Now, we heard that Iraq used mustard gas against Iran, but we did not hear that they did it with the help of intelligence from the CIA. Intelligence reports cited the use of nerve gas by Iraq against Iran. What was Iraq's punishment? At that time, the United States reestablished full diplomatic ties, believe it or not, around Thanksgiving of the year 1984, for the fans of George Orwell.

Throughout 1989 and 1990, U.S. companies, with the permission of the administration of the first President Bush, sent the government of Saddam Hussein tons of mustard gas precursors, live cultures for bacteriological research, helped to build a chemical weapons factory, supplied West Nile virus, supplied fuel air explosive technology and computers for weapons technology, and hydrogen cyanide precursors, and computers for weapons research and development, and vacuum pumps and bellows for nuclear weapons plants.

Now, we have to recognize that our country made a mistake in its past dealings with Iraq; that America made a mistake giving biological weapon capability and chemical weapon capability and nuclear weapon capability to Saddam Hussein. That was a mistake.

But we also have to recognize that the Gulf War destroyed most of that capability; that through 7 years of work, Scott Ritter, an arms inspector, determined that 95 percent of what they were able to track down in terms of Iraq's weapons have been eliminated through that weapons inspection process, and anything else was obliterated during the war. So there is a good reason to believe that Iraq does not have any usable weapons of mass destruction.

I want to conclude this part, and then go to the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE), and then back to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR).

There is a way out of this. We do not have to go to war. It is important that we get those inspectors in there on a timely basis. There is a comprehensive solution to the crisis in Iraq. It appropriately involves the United Nations.

Inspections for weapons of mass destruction should begin immediately, and inspectors should have free and unfettered access to all sites; but, also, we need new negotiations concerning the counterproductive policies of regime change and sanctions. Emergency relief should be expedited; free trade, except in arms, must be permitted; foreign investments must be allowed; and the assets of Iraq abroad must be stored.

So, in conclusion, on this segment, Mr. Speaker, this whole idea about war being inevitable is wrong. War is not inevitable. We do not have to send America's sons and daughters to perish in the streets of Baghdad. We do not have to do that. There is a way out of this, and the American people have a right to expect that we solve this without going to war. They have a right to expect it.

I want to thank my colleague, the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE), who has been articulate and passionate and learned in her explanation of this issue, as she is in her explanation of all issues; who serves honorably and with great integrity on the Committee on the Judiciary.

I want to say what a pleasure it is to have the participation of the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE) in this discussion. I thank the gentlewoman for her presence, and I yield to her.

Ms. JACKSON-LEE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH) and the distinguished gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR).

May I remind those who are here today that this could almost be the debate, if you will, since yesterday was the celebration or commemoration of the signing of the Constitution, we could almost drift back to how seriously the Founding Fathers, though some of the mothers were missing, took the debate in establishing this country.

As I recall, if we would read some of the history books on this, this was not a short-lived debate. The writing of the Constitution was not short-lived. So I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH), my applause to him for being the curdles, if you will, and it sounds like I am saying "kernel" because I have a cold, but curdles in the milk to cause this to rise to the level of hearing of the United States.

I think it is important before I begin my remarks, and I will try to be concise, to let my colleagues who are listening to this debate realize that most of us have been in Iraq meetings all day long, and in fact, all week long.

I think part of our difficulty is to convey to the American people that there is percolating in a broad spectrum of thought across party lines and body lines, House and Senate, there are voices who are raising the thought processes of what we believe the American people would like to us to engage in, raising questions of either skepticism or reason around this very monumental decision.

I do not wish to call colleagues' names who are probably in meetings as we speak, but I remember a meeting this morning where a colleague brought to our attention his service in Vietnam. What rings in my mind is his recounting of 56,000 body bags. This colleague did not mention that to suggest he was fearful of war, or that he would not stand for his Nation again if he was called to do so. But I think he wanted to remind us of the sanctity of our obligation, our moral obligation, as well as the high responsibility that we have as the articulators of foreign policy and the constitutional holders of the responsibility of declaring war.

So I think it is important to know that all around the Congress there are meetings. There are closed-door meetings, there are open meetings, and Members are in discussion about the question of war. It saddens us, of course, that this very active and vigorous questioning does not get shared with the American people.

So this conversation, this debate today, I say to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH), is so vital. I know we will be making this point clear.

Might I say that part of what we are trying to do, I say to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR), we have gotten some suggestions we are going to take from meetings that we have been in all day long to bring in the American people, to hear from them, by opening up our various web sites.

I think, even though this is sort of an instruction comment I am making, I think that will be very important.

□ 1845

Might I say to you that I will be flying home to hold a citizen forum on Iraq with experts on the issues in the area, in Houston. The question will be simple. Should we go to war? And we will open it up at the University of Houston. We will have the opportunity there to hear presentations with questions and answers.

I only say this publicly because I ask my colleagues as we are in meetings here in Washington, because no one is reporting that we are in meetings, that we are having intense discussions, that we go home and do the same.

Now, getting aside those as my issues, let me turn now very briefly again to why I joined my colleagues in saying we have options. The gentlewoman has already eloquently given us a historical perspective about how we have treated Iraq, what we gave to Iraq as the gentleman has said. Let me bring it forward to suggest two themes.

During our recesses we were hearing something that disturbed many of us, the question of regime change. For the life of me, I could not remember in any way where we had adopted a policy on behalf of the United States that I did not like my neighbor and I would simply knock on their door and say, It is time to get out of your house. We all made the point that we, not a one in this Congress would claim that Saddam Hussein is a friend to any of us including his own people. But the United States has never functioned as an offender, has never functioned as a perpetrator, if you will, of violence. We have always been victorious as a defender.

The times we have stepped over the line, we have questioned that policy. And I raise Vietnam because I remember very clearly the domino theory. That is why we went in allegedly. We were fearful of communism spreading, but in the end we lost 56,000. And I am not sure the final conclusion of that, though we never, never, never in any way condemned the young men and women, the men who lost their lives and the valor of our heroes who served us in Vietnam. I will never undermine their services. They are my heroes.

But I took from that a greater responsibility whenever I made a decision as a Member of this body to go to war. And so the point that should be made is that we have an alternative and there is an alternative voice. I believe that voice is free of politics. I, in fact, believe that there are voices and we have heard voices on both sides of the aisle, Republicans, Democrats, and Independents.

For that reason, I believe a very pronounced statement by one of our distinguished colleagues, one of the ranking members of an important committee, the Committee on International Relations, should be heard, that we should have a special session in order to let everyone have the time to deliberate as the Founding Fathers did, so that the members of this Nation can listen to deliberative thought on what the next step should be.

I believe, further, that we have heard a response and we should claim victory where victory has been gained. One, Congress is now engaged based upon the voices that were raised a few weeks ago; and, of course, I think we as Members raised our voices, many of us, even before the recess; and so it was heard and Congress has now actively engaged.

The second victory is that the President of the United States, who I will give applause to, did go to the United Nations. We gave, if you will, the world body the understanding that we do play on the world stage in a unified manner because we will only stand together or fall together. We must give credibility to that decision where the United Nations joined us in saying to Saddam Hussein, we must have unfettered entry into your country. And then what do we get in the last 24 hours? A response back, yes, you can.

Now, we can always reject the bride, the fiancé, I do not know what we wish to call him, on the basis of I have heard this before. But how unfortunate it would be if peace looks us in the eye or some reconciliation looks us in the eye and we do not accept it. I believe it is important that we go with a thousand U.N. inspectors unfettered and immediately respond to Iraq's invitation, get there now and begin to challenge him on his own soil. Let us look.

I do not believe we should spin it, that he is not serious, that this is worthless in terms of his offer and we are now headed towards war. And the reason why I say that, as I try to conclude on some elements of where many of us are thinking, is because another colleague today in a long meeting on Iraq mentioned his constituents who traveled a mighty long way to plead with him of the desperate need of prescription drug benefits through Medicare guarantee, of nursing homes that are closing, of hospitals that may be closing, of Social Security issues that are falling around our knees, of people who have lost millions of dollars in stocks and 401(k)s that we have not responded to, and they asked us to put a reasonable restraint on going to war because they asked us about the money.

I believe he might have responded, I am not putting words in his mouth, that we are already spending a billion dollars a month in Afghanistan. And then he had to confront the article and the statement from Lawrence Lindsey, Bush economic aid says on September 17 that the cost of the Iraq war may top $100 billion.

That is why this debate is so vital, and that is why the voice of those who have been in meetings all day long for fear that nobody is reporting the seriousness of these discussions. I have said this two or three times, this is why we have got to be able to get the attention of the American public and as well the President, that we have an action item, U.N. inspectors, and we do not need to take it to the next level of a war.

I believe if we can engage the American people, we will find the respect of the world because there is no doubt of this Nation's military power. We have to make no excuses for what we have the ability to accomplish.

Our greater, our greater results will be our ability to coalesce in the world arena, to be successful in the agenda of ridding Iraq of these weapons of mass destruction in the manner of the world family and the United Nations, and saying to this country, we will send no son and no daughter into harm's way, into the evils of war without deliberative thought and all manner of diplomacy tried, and all efforts of each and every one of us and the administration working together.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentlewoman because when she spoke of sons and daughters, that is what this is really about. This is about the sons and daughters of American people. It is about the sons and daughters of the Iraqi people who have to suffer this dictator, Saddam Hussein; and it is also about future generations. And so I thank the gentlewoman for participating in this discourse and she is welcome to stay if she can.

I want to go back to our good friend and my colleague, the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR), who has ended the last discussion. We were talking about the impact on oil as an issue here, and I thought she raised some good points; and I wanted to thank her and if the gentlewoman would continue.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to join the gentlewoman from Houston, Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE), and commend her highly for the forum that will be held in Houston on Iraq and should America go to war. As always she is in the forefront of the leadership in this institution and in our country.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to follow up on something that the gentlewoman had stated regarding reasons of war and to point out to those who are listening that there is in this post-Cold War world that there is a shifting of relationships, and nations are trying to find their way forward with new alliances; and the United States in that context has to be careful in order to not be perceived as, one, a Nation that would commit naked aggression. That is something the United States fought for the entirety of the 20th century. Rather, a Nation that always engages for justified wars, justifiable purposes. And there is a distinction, and we should not abrogate our heritage. It is what has gained us the stature that we do have internally and externally.

Mr. Speaker, I also wanted to follow on something the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH) talked about when we were discussing the internal state of Iraq, their economy and their military. I think it is important to put on the record that two-thirds of Saddam Hussein's forces were leveled in the Persian Gulf War. In other words, the force is one-third of what it used to be.

The American people should not have the illusion that over the 10 years during which we and other countries have maintained the no-fly zone over Iraq that there has not been constant bombing and constant economic sanctions that have made life difficult for people inside that country, and, indeed, children dying, not enough food, extraordinary poverty among so many people. The conditions inside Iraq are abysmal.

In addition to that, Iraq essentially is an oil state. And as I mentioned earlier, it has the largest reserves outside of Saudi Arabia. Prior to the Persian Gulf War, Iraq had been pumping 3.5 million barrels a day. Today she pumps but 1.7 million barrels a day. That says that not only are the sanctions hurting her, but the lack of production is hurting her as well.

And Iraq does not operate in a vacuum. She operates in a part of the world where not everyone is her friend. And certainly she has had historic rivalries with Iran, and we all know about the invasion of Kuwait. Iraq is a secular nation in that part of the world that also has tried to defend herself from fears relating to relations with surrounding countries. So I think it is important to be realistic about what is going on there.

Therefore, we read in the Wall Street Journal, September 17, Lawrence Lindsey, the President's head of the White House National Economic Council, making the following statement, "When there is a regime change in Iraq, you could add 3 million to 5 million barrels of production to world supply each day," Mr. Lindsey estimated. "The successful prosecution of the war would be good for the U.S. economy."

Mr. Speaker, the entire article is as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Sept. 17, 2002]

BUSH ECONOMIC AIDE SAYS COST OF IRAQ WAR MAY TOP $100 BILLION

(By Bob Davis)

WASHINGTON.—President Bush's chief economic adviser estimates that the U.S. may have to spend between $100 billion and $200 billion to wage a war in Iraq, but doubts that the hostilities would push the nation into recession or a sustained period of inflation.

Lawrence Lindsey, head of the White House's National Economic Council, projected the "upper bound" of war costs at between 1% and 2% of U.S. gross domestic product. With the U.S. GDP at about $10 trillion per year, that translates into a one-time cost of $100 billion to $200 billion. That is considerably higher than a preliminary, private Pentagon estimate of about $50 billion.

In an interview in his White House office, Mr. Lindsey dismissed the economic consequences of such spending, saying it wouldn't have an appreciable effect on interest rates or add much to the federal debt, which is already about $3.6 trillion. "One year" of additional spending? he said. "That's nothing."

At the same time, he doubted that the additional spending would give the economy much of a lift. "Government spending tends not to be that stimulative," he said. "Building weapons and expending them isn't the basis of sustained economic growth."

Administration officials have been unwilling to talk about the specific costs of a war, preferring to discuss the removal of Mr. Hussein in foreign-policy or even moral terms. Discussing the economics of the war could make it seem as if the U.S. were going to war over oil. That could sap support domestically and abroad, especially in the Mideast where critics suspect the U.S. of wanting to seize Arab oil fields.

Mr. Lindsey, who didn't provide a detailed analysis of the costs, drew an analogy between the potential war expenditures with an investment in the removal of a threat to the economy. "It's hard for me to see how we have sustained economic growth in a world where terrorists with weapons of mass destruction are running around," he said. If you weigh the cost of the war against the removal of a "huge drag on global economic growth for a foreseeable time in the future, there's no comparison."

Other administration economists say that their main fear is that an Iraq war could lead to a sustained spike in prices. The past four recessions have been preceded by the price of oil jumping to higher than $30 a barrel, according to BCA Research.com in Montreal. But the White House believes that removing Iraqi oil from production during a war—which would likely lead to a short-term rise in prices—would be insufficient to tip the economy into recession. What is worrisome, economists say, is if the war widens and another large Middle East supplier stops selling to the U.S., either because of an Iraqi attack or out of solidarity with Saddam Hussein's regime.

Mr. Lindsey said that Mr. Hussein's ouster could actually ease the oil problem by increasing supplies. Iraqi production has been constrained somewhat because of its limited investment and political factors. "When there is a regime change in Iraq, you could add three million to five million barrels of production to world supply" each day, Mr. Lindsey estimated. "The successful prosecution of the war would be good for the economy."

Currently, Iraq produces 1.7 million barrels of oil daily, according to OPEC figures. Before the Gulf War, Iraq produced around 3.5 million barrels a day.

Mr. Lindsey's cost estimate is higher than the $50 billion number offered privately by the Pentagon in its conversations with Congress. The difference shows the pitfalls of predicting the cost of a military conflict when nobody is sure how difficult or long it will be. Whatever the bottom line, the war's costs would be significant enough to make it harder for the Bush administration to climb out of the budget-deficit hole it faces because of the economic slowdown and expense of the war on terrorism.

Mr. Lindsey didn't spell out the specifics of the spending and didn't make clear whether he was including in his estimate the cost of rebuilding Iraq or installing a new regime. His estimate is roughly in line with the $58 billion cost of the Gulf War, which equaled about 1 percent of GDP in 1991. During that war, U.S. allies paid $48 billion of the cost, says William Hoagland, chief Republican staffer of the Senate Budget Committee.

This time it is far from clear how much of the cost—if any—America's allies would be willing to bear. Most European allies, apart from Britain, have been trying to dissuade Mr. Bush from launching an attack, at least without a United Nations resolution of approval. But if the U.S. decides to invade, it may be able to get the allies to pick up some of the tab if only to help their companies cash in on the bounty from a post-Saddam Iraq.

Toppling Mr. Hussein could be more expensive than the Persian Gulf War if the U.S. has to keep a large number of troops in the country to stabilize it once Mr. Hussein is removed from power. Despite the Bush administration's aversion to nation building, Gen. Tommy Franks, commander of U.S. troops in the Middle East and Central Asia, recently said that the U.S. troops in Afghanistan likely would remain for years to come. The same is almost certain to be true in Iraq. Keeping the peace among Iraq's fractious ethnic groups almost certainly will require a long-term commitment of U.S. troops.

During the Gulf War, the U.S. fielded 500,000 troops. A far smaller force is anticipated in a new attack on Iraq. But the GOP's Mr. Hoagland said the costs could be higher because of the expense of a new generation of smart missiles and bombs. In addition, the nature of the assault this time is expected to be different. During the Gulf War, U.S. troops bombed from above and sent tank-led troops in for a lighting sweep through the Iraqi desert. A new Iraq war could involve prolonged fighting in Baghdad and other Iraqi cities—even including house-to-house combat.

The Gulf War started with the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in August 1990, which prompted a brief recession. The U.S. started bombing Iraq on Jan. 16, 1991, and called a halt to the ground offensive at the end of February.

With Iraq's invasion, oil prices spiked and consumer confidence in the U.S. plunged. But Mr. Lindsey said the chance of that happening again is "small." U.S. diplomats have been trying to get assurances from Saudi Arabia, Russia and other oil-producing states that they would make up for any lost Iraqi oil production. In addition, Mr. Lindsey said that the pumping equipment at the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve has been improved so oil is easier to tap, if necessary. Both the Bush and Clinton administrations, he said, wanted to "make sure you can pump oil out quickly."

On Thursday, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan said he doubted a war would lead to recession because of the reduced dependence of the U.S. economy on oil. "I don't think that . . . the effect of oil as it stands at this particular stage, is large enough to impact the economy unless the hostilities are prolonged." Mr. Greenspan told the House Budget Committee. "If we go through a time frame such as the Gulf War, it is unlikely to have a significant impact on us."

The U.S. economy also has become less dependent on oil than it was in 1990, said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Economy.com, an economic consulting group in West Chester, Pa. A larger percentage of economic activity comes from services, as compared with energy-intensive manufacturers, he said. Many of those manufacturers also use more energy-efficient machinery.

We have to begin to connect the dots here with the President's advisers and with what is really going on, knowing the internals of Iraq, the nations that she relates to, her internal economic situation, and keeping our eye on when the enemy is, who was responsible for the World Trade Center, for the Pentagon and for the disaster over Pennsylvania. It is al Qaeda. They do not have roots in Iraq.

We have persistently asked the administration for any ties that they can see there; and I would just urge, as I know my colleagues are, the American people to distinguish between hearsay and evidence regarding what al Qaeda has done and what Iraq's record might be.

Now, is Iraq a perfect country? I daresay not. It is not my favorite form of government. No repressive state is. But in that part of the world there is not a single democracy or functioning democratic republic. It simply does not exist. This is the challenge for the new generation, to embrace this part of the world in ways that builds more open societies. But, certainly, naked aggression by a superpower with no evidence presented to this Congress is not a way to make friends in that part of the world where, frankly, America needs to make friends.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to put on the record tonight if there are any officials who may be listening, and I am sure my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH), would agree with this, from the government of Iraq. I, as one Member of Congress, and I know some of my colleagues would join me in this, would certainly entertain a request from the government of Iraq from Saddam Hussein to meet with Members of this Congress to negotiate the terms of inspection, respecting the role of the United Nations, having members of the United Nations team join us for that; but to extend an open arm to the people of Iraq as we move into this 21st century, to write a new page in history.

We know we do not have a great deal of trust, but one has to confront one's enemies. One has to be able to talk. Only with that kind of negotiation does one avoid war. Whether it is through third parties first and then we move to that step, as I as one Member of Congress would certainly be open to it. And I think that a number of my colleagues would join me in that effort.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, the gentlewoman is correct in suggesting that we should open up discussions and negotiations. I mean, is that not our purpose as a Nation to find a way to communicate with other nations and with the community of nations bring about global security? Certainly when any one nation in that community of nations wants to stand apart and threaten the safety and the peace of the community of nations, that needs to be regarded. That is why we need arms inspectors in Iraq.

But I want to go back to something I said initially, and that is that Iraq has not been connected to 9-11. There is no connection at all. There is no connection between Iraq and al Qaeda.

□ 1900

Even the CIA had to admit that. There is no connection between Iraq and the anthrax attacks. Americans are still grieving about 9-11, but I do not think there is a single person in this country who believes that we should attack a Nation as a payback for 9-11 when they did not have anything to do with it, and yet some people in this confusion are turning around and connecting Iraq with 9-11.

We need the inspectors, but we already know from the work that Scott Ritter did that there are not any usable weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. They do not have the ability to deliver such weapons to attack the United States. If Israel thought they had the ability to deliver such weapons to Israel, Israel has the military force to destroy that Iraqi capability if they had it.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KUCINICH. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to mention during the Persian Gulf War when I served here and Iraq was able to launch some SCUD missiles into Israel, at that time, she could have equipped them with chemical weapons, with biological weapons, but it was not done, and why would that be? I think because Saddam Hussein, as military leader in his own country, recognized that he and his Nation would face annihilation if that happened. So there is a rational military mind working there.

Mr. KUCINICH. The gentlewoman is correct, and we go back to this, that there is a way out of this mess that we are in. We need a comprehensive solution to the crisis in Iraq, and that solution appropriately involves the world community through the United Nations.

Those inspections ought to begin immediately, and we should work cooperatively with all nations to rid Iraq of any weapons of mass destruction or any capability they may have if such weapons exist, and we should come up with a comprehensive solution which includes negotiations over sanctions because we know that hundreds of thousands of innocent Iraqi children have perished because of those sanctions, and we should include negotiations over the no-fly zone. We need to create a framework in the region for a zone free of weapons of mass destruction to ensure we do not come back to the situation at another time.

The thing that gets me is we want Iraq to give up weapons of mass destruction if they have them, but why would Saddam Hussein want to cooperate with the United States if we have a policy of regime change which also includes a policy of wanting to assassinate him? If you have inspectors in your country and they are measuring you for a box, you might think twice about showing them around because sooner or later something might happen to you.

So if we truly want to get rid of weapons of mass destruction, we should set aside the regime change policy which defeats the goal of assuring compliance. We should rescind our policy which permits assassination of foreign leaders. I think there is a comprehensive solution which can avoid the war, and if the administration truly desires a solution without war, it must explain how that squares with its stated policy of regime change.

The goal of the United Nations is weapons inspections with these competing goals of, on one hand, weapons inspections and then regime change is going to make it very difficult to have peaceful resolution. I think that war is not inevitable here. Except if the administration's goal, if the irreducible goal is the overthrow of the Iraqi government, then we are going to have difficulty completing the inspections in which we place so much hope.

So one of the things that we have been told over the last few weeks is that Iraq presents an imminent threat. A number of us have had discussions across the country, and we have talked to people who are really learned on these arms issues, and they say Iraq really is not an imminent threat. So what is the rush to war? In my district, which is similar to the gentlewoman from Ohio's (Ms. KAPTUR), in Toledo, in Cleveland, people talk about an imminent threat, but they do not talk about Iraq. They talk about the threat of not having health insurance. There are 41 million people in this country without health insurance. That is imminent threat. Senior citizens talk about not having access to a plan which can reduce the cost of prescription drugs for them. The high cost of prescription drugs, that is an imminent threat to the American people.

The corruption in Wall Street which took hundreds of billions of dollars away from investors over a period of time, that is an imminent threat. So many people lost their 401(k)s. That is imminent threat.

People in our manufacturing industries losing their job, that is imminent threat to the American people and a long-term threat to our economy. I get calls in my office in Cleveland from people who are right on the edge of losing their homes. They have an imminent threat of losing their homes. People who need a job, retirees who lost their health insurance because their company went bankrupt, they are an imminent threat because they cannot get decent health care and they are in their senior years, not yet eligible for Medicare, though.

American people have a right to expect that we do something about these issues that affect their domestic economy, but because of all this war talk, because of this talk of an imminent threat from Iraq, which does not have usable weapons of mass destruction, which does not have the ability to deliver those weapons, which has not indicated an intent to do so, which did not have anything to do with 9-11, which did not have anything to do with al Qaeda, which did not have anything to do with the anthrax attacks, because of this imminent threat by Iraq, we somehow are supposed to forget all of the concerns of the American people who are suffering in this economy and an economy which is slowing down. We are supposed to forget all that because Iraq is an imminent threat.

Iraq is not an imminent threat, but the destruction of the American economy, the destruction of people's 401(k)s, the destruction of a family when someone has a serious illness and they cannot pay for it, that is an imminent threat, and we in this country have an obligation. We should demand that this country start focusing on the real problems which affect the daily lives of the American people. I did not come here to have to cast a vote on a bogus war against Iraq to let the real human concerns of my people in my district go wanting.

As the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE) said, $100 billion and more will be spent on this war and my senior citizens in my district are splitting their pills so they can make their prescriptions last because they cannot afford the cost of a prescription drug.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his passionate statement and the people of the Cleveland area are indeed fortunate to have him here.

I would only add, when the gentleman talks about imminent threat, that if one looks at why we are in the current recession and what triggered it, it was rising oil prices, as happened during the 1970s, when the Arab oil embargo twice delivered body blows to this economy and we had prices skyrocket. The price of oil doubled per barrel until the OPEC nations said, gosh, this is not so good if we make America fall to its knees because of imported oil. Then it started to control prices from places like Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, United Arab Emirates, all those countries, and then we moved into the Persian Gulf War in the early 1990s when Iraq invaded Kuwait, and again, why? Because of the threat to the world economy, especially our own, and the instability inherent in these oil economies.

Then just 2 years ago next month, the suicide bombing of the USS Cole in Yemen harbor, our destroyer. What was she doing there? Guarding the lanes of commerce as those oil tankers come out of the Persian Gulf into the West here, unload, and then it is refined here. Now, with Iraq and all these statements being made by the Bush administration, which has enormous ties to oil, it is no secret that Kenneth Lay and Enron were the largest contributors to the Bush campaign, we have this drumbeat for more U.S. involvement in that part of the world where oil props up every single one of those countries, whether it is Saudi Arabia, whether it is Iraq, whether it is Kuwait.

We really start looking around and saying, oh, and even Afghanistan, where the pipeline has to run from the Caspian Sea through Afghanistan in order for that crude oil to reach its destination, one of the imminent threats to the United States where over half of our oil is now imported, 25 percent of it from that part of the world, about 28 percent actually, we have to become energy self-sufficient here at home.

So I would say to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KUCINICH) thanks for all the efforts he has made with us to move into renewable energy supplies from a hydrocarbon economy to a carbohydrate, a photovoltaic economy, moving into fuel cells and new forms of power for this country so we can cut the umbilical cord to so many of these places in the world that have undemocratic regimes, and every time a consumer in our country goes to the gas pump, half the money they pay for that fuel goes to Saudi Arabia, Iraq. It goes to Venezuela, Nigeria. Not a single democratic republic among them.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I have a report here that was done by Miriam Pemberton, who is with the Institute for Policy Studies. She delivered this to a congressional briefing. She said that fears that the U.S. might go ahead with an attack on Iraq have already begun to affect oil prices. When people are going around to the pumps, just the talk of war is starting to affect oil prices. Oil is already trading close to an 18-month high of $30 a barrel. Ten months ago, according to this report, we forget, but 10 months ago, the price was half that. So within 10 months, oil has doubled in the price per barrel.

As the war fever keeps going, in effect what we have, the war fever has created a premium. So the oil companies are making more money on the war talk, and each time a U.S. official comes out and says something, she says in this report, that suggests an attack is actually imminent or is likely to happen, oil prices spike.

Vice President CHENEY made the first of two such speeches on August 26, for example, and by the end of the day the price of each barrel sold on the U.S. market had jumped 65 cents. Think about that, what war talk does.

What does a real war do? The last invasion of Iraq, right after it, oil prices doubled. They stayed high, according to this report, for the better part of a year. A repeat would create ripple effects throughout our economy. Miriam Pemberton says that estimates by Wall Street analysts indicate that a $10 per barrel rise in oil prices, that would be half the amount of the last Gulf War, would over a year's time reduce U.S. GDP growth by about half a percent and add nearly 1 percent to inflation.

She goes on to say the economic drag from this oil price shock is being felt most strongly across the transportation sectors, and she also says that most analysts expect that a U.S. attack on Iraq would send the price of oil beyond $50 a barrel. In other words, more than three times what it was 10 months ago.

So I think that we need to understand that the cost of war is not only in our tax dollars, not only in this horrible cost of the lives of the young men and women we send over there, but also when we combine it with the tax cuts and the large increases in military spending, we are looking at a disaster for our economy. Slower growth, a recession. So we should be very concerned about the economic impact, the immediate impact of this war, and we should be concerned about the long-term economic impact of this war.

This is still about the economy, and remember, all of these debates get swept aside with the war talk. Each time the administration stands up and talks about war, we pay for it at the gas pump.

If we go to war, the prices are going to go up three times what they were 10 months ago. These are the concerns I have.

Mr. Speaker, in the closing few minutes I would like to, with my colleague, the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR), talk about what I am hearing from my constituents in Cleveland. When they ask me what can we do, what can anyone do about this rush towards war, talk about a few things that are possible. I hear from the people in my district; they do not want a war. They expect us to solve this without going to war. They expect that we have the talent and the ability to solve these very difficult problems with other nations, particularly with a nation that used to be a good friend over in the gulf and to whom we sold chemical and biological and nuclear weapons capabilities; and if we could do that a few years ago, why not solve this. Look at the battlefields of World War II. We were at war with Japan and Germany, and they are our good friends now.

We need to work with the international community now. Let us suppose this effort, despite all of our work, just keeps moving along. What can people do, they ask me. Here is what can be done. There needs to be meetings all over this Nation in city councils, town halls, in labor halls and community centers. People need to come together, and they need to talk about how they feel about this. They need to organize.

When I was elected to city council in Cleveland many years ago, I got elected by knocking on doors. I did not have any money. I just went door to door and talked to people. We need to talk to each other again. We need an up-lifting of our civic consciousness. We need to recreate our civic soul in this country. We need to recreate our national sense of conscience; and we do it by talking to each other, by organizing door to door. Go to your neighbors, create a place for a meeting. Take the information door to door about the meeting. Let people know where they can come to talk about it and then talk about gathering more and more people. Gather by the thousands in your town squares. This is what I tell my constituents.

We need a national revival of this concept of government of the people. Government of the people works because people stay involved. Lincoln's prayer, the prayer that he gave at Gettysburg, a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, the way it is realized is when people get involved. So knock on doors. Put a piece of literature in people's hands, I tell my constituents. Tell them how they can come to a meeting. Tell them that they are needed. Bring people together, set an agenda, invite your Member of Congress or other government officials. Invite church leaders to moderate it. We need it talk to each other about this. We can avoid this war. It is not inevitable. We need to connect again with each other.

Each of us is an architect of the world, and our thoughts and words and our deeds are part of that structure of the world. We can recreate the world right now. War is not inevitable. Peace is inevitable if we begin talking to each other and organize at a community level.

There are polling lists available. You can go to a board of elections and find out who the voters are in your precinct, and you can get a list of phone numbers and call people and go back to contacting people, hold those meetings and hold those rallies. I believe, as I tell my constituents about this, that we can turn this around, that we are not stuck with war; but we need to hear from the American people. And my constituents, I tell them, if you talk to your neighbors about it, we can catalyze a change in this country. And I know that the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR) works closely with her constituents and tells them how they can make a difference.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, some of the best forums that we have involved a combination of universities, church leaders, community activists, citizens, just inviting ordinary citizens to learn. Many people feel powerless. They feel this is foreign policy, what can I do about that. I think they underestimate their own power.

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentlewoman is right. Today we have this new structure of the Web. They say I do not know how to use it. I say ask your kids. They have computers. They can get you on a site and you can start to talk to people.

We need to use the available technology that we have; but the best technology in a democracy is the human heart because across this country people can feel in their hearts that this war is wrong. Across this country, people know that America has a higher destiny, that it is not our destiny to be the policeman of the world. It is not our destiny to choose who should be the ruler or leader of another nation. It is our destiny to fulfill the democracy here and to defend freedom when we must.

I want to thank the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. KAPTUR) and the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE) for participating here and for starting this discussion that war is not inevitable, that Iraq was not connected to 9-11, that there is a chance that we can move forward with our intelligence, that we can some day evolve to a place where what President Franklin Roosevelt called the science of human relationships can be used to resolve our problems, not weapons technology which destroy, but our own capability to evolve in heart and soul, to become more than we are so we fulfill this dream of our founders of a government which is enlightened and a government which has a special connection to its people.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PLATTS). The Chair would remind Members to direct their remarks to the Chair and not to the television audience.

IMMIGRATION REFORM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. TANCREDO) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. TANCREDO. Mr. Speaker, I want to address the House tonight on an issue of importance, I think, to the Nation in terms of what we are facing in the area of domestic policy decision, which I think is an extremely important one for the country. Not surprisingly, I am going to be talking about immigration and immigration reform and a number of related issues this evening.

Mr. Speaker, recently in the Colorado newspapers there have been a series of stories and editorials about an incident that occurred some time ago that was brought to the attention of the public as a result of a story published in the Denver Post maybe a month ago, perhaps a little more than that. The story was one that identified a particular individual in Colorado, actually a particular family in Colorado who were illegal immigrants to the United States.

According to the news reports, even the Denver Post went to the Mexican consul in Denver or the Mexican consul went to the Post, I am not sure which way it happened, but somehow or other they got together and decided to write a story about a family, the Apodaca family. They decided to highlight a particular individual, a young man that is the oldest son of the family, I believe, who is graduating from a school in Aurora, Colorado, in my district, who has evidently been a model student with very good grades who is now faced with a dilemma. The dilemma is what to do about going to college; how is he going to pay for it.

Mr. Speaker, across the country there are several attempts being made to change State laws with regard to illegal immigrants' access to higher education. I believe several States have actually changed their laws that will allow in-state tuition for kids who are themselves illegal or parents of illegal immigrants. This is a major push on the part of the Mexican Government through the Mexican consuls throughout the United States, and it is a major push by immigration advocates all over the country and groups like La Raza and others who want a variety of things, including free K-12 education which they already have, free or taxpayer-subsidized public education, which they do not now have, and driver's licenses and welfare and a number of other things that would add up to citizenship. That is really the point of all of this.

The attempt is being made to erase anything that would be a distinguishing of someone being here illegally. Because after all, if you can come to the United States illegally, put your kids into school, which you can today under Supreme Court rules, have them educated at taxpayer expense, if you can eventually get taxpayers to subsidize their higher education, if you can get taxpayers to subsidize welfare, to pay for welfare for illegal immigrants into the country, if you can get State legislatures to change their laws to provide driver's licenses to people who are here illegally, then what happens, after a while there is nothing that separates you from anyone who is here legally.

If you are present, if you are physically present in the country that we call the United States, you will have all of the benefits of being a citizen, and it does not matter how you got here. This is the desire. This is the hope; this is the plan. To some extent it has been successful, as I say, in several State legislatures. I think California is one, perhaps Utah is another. But the same thing is going on in Colorado.

So there was this plan, if you will, to begin a lobbying process to change our laws in Colorado to allow people who are here, who are in the country and in Colorado in this particular case illegally, to have access to higher education. So the Mexican consul provided the names of a family, the Apodaca family, to the Denver Post. This was a particularly sympathetic case because apparently these folks came here 7 or 8 years ago, by their own admission illegally, but have so far lived the lives of model citizens. They send their kids to school. They are employed, or at least the husband is employed; and so they now are in this precarious position. They are trying to figure out what to do about the problem they face. How do you send your kids to higher ed, to the University of Colorado?

So about a month ago, as I say, the Denver Post highlighted these people. They in fact put them on the front page of the Denver Post, this family, put in a picture and ran this very, very long story about the family and said, gee, these people, yes, they are here illegally, but they are not concerned about that. They are, as I say, giving their names and locales to the paper and we should in fact now be, of course, cognizant of and sympathetic to their plight.

I read this story as did hundreds of thousands of other people in Colorado and thought, is it not interesting that we are now at the point where people who are here illegally can be so brazen as to make that known publicly without the slightest fear of any sort of negative ramifications? Is it not amazing, I thought, that the Mexican consul would be so audacious as to become involved in domestic politics in the United States? And, more importantly, is it not an affront to every single person who has come to this country legally? Is it not a slap in the face to every single person in this country who has gone through the brain damage and the expense of coming here through the legal process?

Mr. Speaker, I have been able to go up to Commerce City, Colorado, where we have had and where they still have ceremonies to recognize people who are now taking their oath of citizenship to the country. They are becoming new citizens. I have gone there and I have spoken to these groups and I have said, first of all, I want to welcome you to the United States. Secondly, I want to thank you for doing it the right way, for going through the process, for spending the time, the money, for being inconvenienced as I know you are, for trying to learn the language as you are supposed to do. I want to thank you for all of that, because you are acting as good citizens. And every time that we do things like provide amnesty for people who come here illegally, it is a slap in the face to all those who have done it the right way.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my office as I know you do and every Member of this Congress, we have lists of people who have applied for some sort of change in their immigration status and they have asked us to help. And we have. Well over 100 I saw at last count in our office alone. I know that in certain other districts, certain other congressional districts, the numbers are higher; but in mine, a relatively suburban district, 100, that is quite a few for us. We have actually two people assigned to helping those folks come into the United States or if they are here, to get their status adjusted under the law. That is a resource allocation that I think is unique. I do not believe I have two people among my staff who have a single responsibility or at least have some partial responsibility for a single issue. But that is the load we have, and that is the dedication I have to trying to help.

I thought to myself when I read this story on the front page of the Denver Post that it is amazing that we are so blatant, so fearless about the fact that you do not have to go through that process; that, in fact, you are suckers if you do; that you are being naive if you try to abide by the laws; that you will become celebrities. You will be on the front page of the Denver Post. You will be characterized as heroes because you have lived a good life and you have done what is expected of you in America, you have had a job and you send your kids to school; and therefore because you are an "A" student, we should ignore the fact that you are here illegally and tell everyone in America who is here because they came the right way that they have been suckers.

It also tells everybody in the world who is waiting for the opportunity to come to the United States legally that they should probably simply ignore the bureaucracy, which can be daunting in terms of the obstacles it sets up, and they should simply go to the head of the line. They should simply pass by everybody waiting and enter the gate. That is what amnesty does and that is what we tell people when we showcase them for being here illegally.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know the Apodacas. From everything I have read, they seem to be very fine people who have, as I say, tried to come to the United States for the same reasons that my grandparents, perhaps yours, came here, looking for a better life. I do not blame them for wanting it. But I must admit to you that when the decision was made by the Denver Post and the family and the Mexican consul to showcase these people, they put those folks in jeopardy. Because somebody is going to say, Is this right that you can violate the laws of the Nation with such impunity? Is it right that all those who have attempted to do it the right way should be so insulted? I certainly did not think so when I read the story.

So I waited about 3 weeks or more and finally I called the INS office in Denver and I said, can I please speak to the head of the agency? It was a gentleman by the name of Mr. Comfort. Again, a very nice fellow whom I have met with in the past. I asked him in the beginning of our conversation, I have a hypothetical situation to present to you and that is this: today, Mr. Comfort, you as the head of the regional office for the INS, if you walked out of the office and were heading over to lunch at a restaurant across the street and somebody came up to you on the street and said, I want to tell you something if you don't mind. I am a person who is a good citizen. I have a job. I have never been in trouble with the law. I send my kids to school. I'm trying to get them an education, but I have this one problem. I am here illegally. What would you do under those circumstances?

He said, Well, of course I would have to take them into custody. Those were his exact words. I would have to take them into custody at that point, and I would have to then put them through the judicial process. They would have a hearing. It would be determined by an immigration law judge as to whether or not they should be deported.

I said, That is interesting to me, because I am wondering what you did about the family that told you that, told not you that, but told the entire State of Colorado that 3 or 4 weeks ago. They said they were here illegally. They were looking for someone to help support their son's higher education goals and expenses.

He said, Yeah, we saw that; we looked into it, but we're not going to do anything about it.

I said, How come? I just asked you what you would do if this happened to you on the street.

He said, It's a resource thing. I don't have the resources to actually go after these people.

I said, I'm not asking you to send in a SWAT team. I'm not asking you to devote any resources to this issue that would jeopardize the major tasks you have in terms of felons who are here illegally and potential terrorists and all that sort of thing. I don't want you to do that. I'm just asking you what you do when somebody tells you this, as these people did and as the Denver Post and as the Mexican consul did.

He said, I really don't know what to say. We don't have the resources. He kept saying, We don't have the resources.

I said, again, What does it take? Would you send a letter? Would you at least send a letter to the folks and ask them to please come in and talk to you about the fact that they have stated publicly that they are here illegally? He said, yes, that they would do that.

Shortly thereafter, I received a call from the Denver Post wanting a follow-up interview to the original story about these folks. I told the Denver Post, it was amazingly coincidental, but I had just talked to the INS and I told them this story. The next day the Denver Post wrote a story, it appeared again on the front page and it was entitled something like "Tancredo Demands the Deportation of this 'A' Student." Forget about the fact that that was an interesting spin that they put on it because I never even mentioned the student in my conversations with the INS. I was talking about the family who had made this statement to the Post. But, regardless, that was the story. It has been amazing in terms of the reaction to it.

I have had literally thousands of e-mail and telephone calls and letters about this into my office. Overwhelmingly, I should say that the letters and e-mails are supportive. But the Denver Post is very upset about the fact that I did this. I have tried to explain to them that really what I did was what hundreds of other citizens I know have tried to do and that is to talk to the INS, get them to look into the situation, the situation that individuals may feel exists out there in terms of illegals being here and that the INS routinely ignores those inquiries and/or reports from John Q. Citizen. In this case because I was able to get the head of the INS on the phone and speak to him directly, they were perhaps less able to ignore my request to them to look into the issue.

I did not demand, I should say, anyone's deportation, not Jesus Apodaca who was the young man that was identified in this story as being the "A" student who is looking for a college education, or anyone else. I simply said, Would you look into this, would you simply send a letter and ask these people to come in and talk to you? But the press has portrayed this in a way, as you might imagine, to make it appear as though I have taken it upon myself to become the head of the INS and "bully," I think is the word they use most often, and "mean-spirited," another one that they throw in there.

Then yesterday we got a call from the same reporter who had done this story, and he said, we have found out because of good reporting that Congressman TANCREDO has hired people to work in his home, in his home, in this case to finish a basement, and they were illegal, they were here illegally, and they wanted to know whether we had a response. My response was, I in fact did hire a company, a very reputable company to finish my basement and to put in a home theater for a Christmas present to my family. It was truly an expensive one, but it is one that we were able to pay for by refinancing my home, which is what we did. I went to a company in Denver, I purchased the equipment, and I asked if they also installed. They said yes. I said I also need the basement to be finished for this. They said they could do that. A part of their company was also a construction company.

I hired them for this purpose. They were expensive, it is true, but we checked out their references and they were good. And we felt because they had promised me to get it done by Christmas last year, that we would go ahead and pay the extra money that we thought we were paying compared to other estimates to get this job done. So we hired them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, frankly, as you know, we are not home often, especially if you live as far away from Washington as I do. We are home sometimes on the weekend and during break. But we put a lockbox on our door and we gave the key to the lockbox to the construction company. And they were absolutely efficient and they did a great job, and I can say nothing but good things about the experience. They finished exactly when they said they were going to finish. The job is a great job. I have nothing to complain about whatsoever. Now, I have no idea who they hired, where they came from or anything else.

But, anyway, the Denver Post tomorrow is going to run a story, we are told, they called us tonight to tell us they are going to run a story tomorrow that states what I have just told you, that we have had people working in our home who were in fact illegal immigrants.

Somehow, of course, I know they are going to try and tie this to me, that I either knew, or, I do not know exactly what the point of it is, but I know they are very upset about the fact that we have called them on this issue of highlighting the Apodaca family. So, as a "result of good reporting," they have uncovered some more illegal aliens who are in Colorado, and they are going to publish a story tomorrow about that.

Now, I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have been called a bully, I have been called mean-spirited, because I called the INS and asked them to look into the Apodaca story, which had been printed in the paper serial several weeks before. But, Mr. Speaker, I have to also tell you that I do not seek out people who are here illegally. I do not ask people who may be serving me at a restaurant, who may be doing my lawn work or putting on the roof of my house, or, in this case, the laborers of a company that I hired to put in a home theater system and finish my basement, I do not ask them to show me proof of the fact that the people, I do not say, you know, the waiter that you sent me last night could not speak English very well, or the cab driver that I got when I came over here could not speak English very well, so I would like to see whether or not they are here illegally. I do not do that. I think that would be sort of mean-spirited, frankly, I do not do that.

I only got into this issue, became even acquainted with the Apodaca family, because the Post and Mexican Consul and the family themselves choose to make themselves known to me and to the rest of the people in Colorado, the entire citizenry.

So, I do not know, Mr. Speaker, frankly, I have not the foggiest idea of whether or not the people who were employed by the company that I hired were illegal. I know they were good workers and did a great job. That is all I know. But if the Denver Post continues to press this, if they identify people and companies, then, of course, I would tell the INS the same thing: "Look, the Denver Post is once again pointing out people who are here illegally. Are you going to do something about it?"

But I want to try to just make people understand the nature of this debate. I know that I suffer the slings and arrows. I know that I am going to be vilified in the paper. Tomorrow I am sure that the article that the Denver Post writes about me will not be complimentary. But, you know, I guess I am really thinking aloud here with you tonight, and that is, who is really the bully? Who is really mean-spirited here?

I hope that we will enforce our immigration laws in this country. I hope that we will stiffen those laws. I hope that we will in fact even put military troops on the border to help enforce immigration laws. But I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, quite honestly, that if this Nation decides that it does not wish to enforce immigration laws, that if we do not wish to have a border that requires somebody to get permission to cross, that is okay with me. It is not okay, I would be a no vote on that bill, but let us assume for a moment that this House and the Senate, the other body, I should say, and the President agree that we should abandon this whole concept of border security and immigration policy. If it is the will of the majority, I would live by it.

The idea that we can have a law in place that says you cannot enter the country illegally, but, on the other hand, if you do, and if you are a nice guy and if you have got a kid who is an A student, I do not know, if he is a B student, I am not sure we would cut him this slack, or C or D or F, or maybe if he does not go to school at all, maybe then we should try to deport him. So maybe we should make an immigration policy that depends upon someone's grade point average, or whether or not they have simply been in the country a while and kept a job and stayed out of trouble.

You know, whatever we do, whatever this Congress and the Senate decide to do, the other body decides to do, and the President agrees to, that is the law of the land and I certainly would abide by it. But if we, unfortunately for the Apodacas, have a law that says if you come into the country illegally you are subject to deportation, even if your child is an A student, even if you have lived in the country as model citizens, you do not have the right to citizenship, as long as that is the law of the land, then let me ask you, is it being a bully to ask the INS to enforce the law?

Now, again, Mr. Speaker, I want to say we know there are between 9 million and 13 million people who are here illegally. That is true. I have not the foggiest idea how many people I may have hired in the past as taxi drivers, as waiters, waitresses, home improvement people. I have not the foggiest idea how many of those people may have been here illegally, and it is not my job to ask them. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is against the law to do so. You could be sued under the Civil Rights Act if you go out and ask people that have been hired by somebody else if they are here illegally or not. I do not do that. I do not inquire.

If you go to the Denver Post or any other newspaper and you say, "I am here illegally and here is the benefits that I want," then, of course, I think it is a different situation, and the Denver Post and the Mexican Consul and this family have to take some responsibility for making the choice to become prominently displayed on the front page of a major newspaper.

Now, I know that this is a very controversial and very emotional issue. I know that, and I do not relish the idea of being here and discussing it. Frankly, there are other things that are also important to me, other issues; the tax policy of the country, the war, the potential war with Iraq, there are a whole bunch of things that weigh on my conscience very heavily and weigh on my mind, as I know they do on yours, Mr. Speaker, and every other Member of this body.

But I must admit to you that what is happening here by attempts in this case by the Mexican Consul and sympathetic news media, the attempts to characterize illegal immigration as benign, that is wrong and it is dangerous. The Apodaca family, certainly from all accounts I have read, anyway, are no danger to the United States. They pose no danger. They seem like good people, people I would be happy to have as neighbors and friends. But it is irrelevant to the issue as to whether or not they have broken the law to come into the country.

What is the most discouraging or disconcerting aspect of this whole thing is that when trying to characterize and personify the illegal immigration issue by using the Apodacas, what you do is ignore another face of illegal immigration that is much, much uglier, much nastier. That is the face of illegal immigration that you confront on the borders of this country, both the Canadian border and the Mexican border. It is the face of murder, it is the face of infiltration into the country of people who are coming to do us great harm, it is the face of drug smuggling. It is the face of rape and robbery, because coyotes who often bring these people, in this case from Mexico, into the United States, they charge them sometimes $1,000 or $1,500 to bring them into the United States illegally, and when they get to the borders they rape the women, they steal the money, they force the people into the United States into some of the most inhospitable parts of the country in terms of the desert, and they die out there. This is an ugly thing.

It is the face of murder, where a little over a month and a half ago a young man by the name of Kris Eggle, who was a Park Service employee, he was a Park Ranger in the Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument in Arizona, and Chris, who was 28 years old, along with a colleague in the Border Patrol, stopped two Mexicans who had come across the border after having murdered four people in Mexico in some sort of drug deal type of thing that went awry, or they were hit men for some cartel, I do not know all of the details. But they came into the United States. They were stopped by this young man, 28 years old, and when he got out of the car, he was killed. They opened up on him with automatic weapons and killed him.

I went to his funeral in Ajo, Arizona, where I saw his mother and his father, I saw all of his colleagues from the Border Patrol, from the Park Service, from the Customs agency, all of them coming to pay their respects. But I saw no one else from the government. I saw no members of the media to talk about that face of illegal immigration into the country.

I have not heard a thing about the fact that a short time ago, maybe less than a week ago, two FBI agents on the border near El Paso, I believe, were abducted, dragged across the line and beaten almost to death. They are both in the hospital in Texas in critical condition. I have seen nothing about that face of illegal immigration.

I have seen nothing about the fact that hundreds and hundreds of thousands of pounds of illegal narcotics are confiscated on our borders with both Canada and Mexico every year, and I have seen nothing about the fact that agents are routinely placed in harm's way, Border Patrol agents, U.S. Forest Service personnel, are placed in harm's way and injured and in fact killed in defense of the Nation's immigration policy, so-called immigration policy.

□ 2000

I have seen nothing about that in the Denver Post.

I have seen nothing about the fact that I received the following message from someone who will remain anonymous, but here is what he says: "Sir: Until about 5 months ago I was a U.S. Border Patrol agent. I was recently informed by a friend who is still with the U.S. Border Patrol of another Ramirez-type incident that Border Patrol agents had been ordered not to talk about and that the Border Patrol is desperately trying to keep away from the media. A Catholic nun was recently raped and murdered in Oregon by a Mexican illegal alien who was apprehended earlier by U.S. Border Patrol agents in Deming, New Mexico. The IDENT/ENFORCE system worked and the system alerted the agent that the alien was a violent criminal. The subject was released back into Mexico where he promptly made his way back into the United States, traveled to Oregon and raped two nuns, one of which was also murdered. The Border Patrol has put the word out to its agents that this information is not to be divulged to anyone outside the U.S. Border Patrol. The patrol agent in charge of the Deming, New Mexico station has been relieved and temporarily assigned to the sector headquarters in El Paso, Texas. The killing of the nun made the news, but the fact that the killer is an illegal alien recently captured and released by the U.S. Border Patrol did not. Hopefully, you can change that. Keep up the good work."

Well, thank you, sir, for your courage in telling me and telling, therefore, the country about this. Because I can assure my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, that this will not be on the front page of the Denver Post tomorrow. The fact that I hired a company that purportedly hired illegal aliens to work on my basement, according to what we were told tonight by the Post, but this will not, although the story has certainly made news earlier, they said it was news in Oregon, it will not be there, because this is not the face of illegal immigration that the press wants to present to the American public. However, this is the face of illegal immigration on our borders.

Mr. Speaker, I have come to this floor many times. I have no doubt that my concerns about illegal immigration, about the immigration issue have made me a number of very powerful enemies. I have no doubt that they will from this point on hound me, dog me, find out who delivers the milk to my house, who cuts our lawn. I mean, I have no idea to what extent they will go to try and vilify me for bringing the message. I guess, of course, it is an intimidating thing, but I also know that, because I have to ask myself and my own conscience, is this the right thing to do. I have to search my own conscience, Mr. Speaker, about why I do it. Is it out of some sort of animosity or animus that I have? I truly do not believe that is the case. I know that I would be doing essentially the same thing, as millions of others who are seeking a better life in the United States, I would be looking for a way into the country.

I do not necessarily blame the people who come here illegally. I blame our own government for encouraging it on the one hand by refusing to actually secure our borders, and periodically giving amnesty so as to tell people all over the world that the message is, by the way, to come into the United States, and for not cracking down on people who hire illegal aliens. If they knowingly hire somebody who is here illegally, then, of course, there is a price to pay. And I only suggest that if we want to have an immigration policy that establishes what the borders of the United States are and that one must ask permission to come across them, as we must do going to either Canada or Mexico, that the law, and that those borders, ought to be actually upheld.

It is amazing to me and incredibly ironic in a way that the Mexican consul has been so actively involved with trying to change our immigration status. It is amazing to me that the Mexican consul and advocates for immigration policies, for liberal immigration policies continually ignore the laws that are in place in our neighboring countries, Canada and Mexico. I have yet to see in the Mexican press or the Canadian press negative stories about the fact that in these countries if you enter illegally, you can be prosecuted for that. I have yet to see a story in the press about the fact that neither Canada nor Mexico, nor any other country of which I am aware, will allow you to go to school at their expense, at the taxpayers' expense of that country, go on to higher education at the taxpayers' expense of that country, if you are not a citizen of that country.

I have never seen an article written attacking any country for their mean-spirited immigration policy. I have never seen the Mexican consul speak out in the United States, and certainly I would be amazed if they did, of course, against the repressive actions taken by the Mexican Government against Guatemalans who periodically come into the country of Mexico illegally. Often, the Mexican Government will send troops to that southern border, to their southern border and they will also, by the way, round up, and I mean that in the ugliest sense of the words, round up illegal Guatemalans, illegal aliens into Mexico from Guatemala, they will round them up, send them back, they will incarcerate them.

Mr. Speaker, I have actually been in detention facilities in Mexico for people who have entered their country illegally. They are not nice places. I assure my colleagues that the detention facilities that we have in the United States are more like Hilton hotels than in comparison to the detention facility for illegal entrance into Mexico. But there has not been a word of concern about that, has there? Have I missed it? Has any paper in the United States attacked the Mexican Government for their attitude about illegal immigrants into Mexico? Has any media outlet in this country suggested that Mexico should begin educating all children who go to Mexico, regardless of where they are from, at the expense of the Mexican taxpayer? We do that. We do that because the Supreme Court has ruled that if you are here, even if you are illegal, we need to give you a K-12 education.

Now, so far they have not ruled that we have to give you a higher education at taxpayers' expense, but that is what they are seeking. That is what the people that support a liberalized immigration policy, that is what they are seeking. I have never heard anybody else, any other country chastised because they do not do what they are demanding of us. So is it mean-spirited, truly, for me to suggest that if we have an immigration policy, we should uphold it; if we do not wish to do so, we should abandon it?

I assure my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, and I have said this on the floor many times, that I wish there was someone with the courage to introduce a bill into this House that says we will abandon our borders, there is no need for them, we want the free flow of goods, services, and people. And if it passes, over my "no" vote, if it passes and if it passes the other body, and if it is signed by the President, that is the law of the land, and I walk away from the issue. But if, on the other hand, we pretend that we have borders and that for some reason that is important, which I think it is, then should we not do everything possible to uphold the law about those borders, especially, especially, Mr. Speaker, in times like these, in times that present the United States with the potential for catastrophic terrorist activity, catastrophic events that could be perpetrated by people who have come across our borders illegally? Should we not try to defend those borders? Should we not try?

When we go to the American public, either the administration or the Congress goes to the American public and says, we are trying to do everything we can, we are doing everything we can to protect you, can we be truthful in that, Mr. Speaker? Do we believe that we are doing everything we can to protect America? If that is the case, then why is it still possible for, say, one mile on either side of any port of entry in the country, you can walk across and no one is going to stop you? Is that really doing everything that we can to protect the United States of America? Should we not be as interested in defending our own borders as we are in defending the borders of Korea or Kosovo? Should we not be as concerned about our own safety in this country as we are about perhaps deposing Saddam Hussein and, therefore, removing a threat to the United States, which I happen to agree with? I mean, I agree that he is a threat and that we should depose him. But is it not just as important for us to defend our own country at the closest point of vulnerability, and that point is the northern, the southern, eastern and western borders of the United States? I cannot for the life of me understand why we do not pursue that as aggressively as we do a war with Iraq.

If we go to war with Iraq, does anyone not believe that the danger to the United States increases exponentially, that the danger will not come on the battlefields of Iraq necessarily, although that is certainly a dangerous place, but it will also come as a result of increased infiltration into the United States of fundamentalist Islamic cells designed and with the purpose, I should say, of doing us great harm? Would that not be only logical to assume as a possibility? And should any country not do the rational thing and try to actually defend those borders, even if it means preventing the flow of illegal immigrants into the country who are not coming to harm us?

But, Mr. Speaker, we cannot set up a sieve that distinguishes that. We cannot really expect people on the border to go, I see you coming across here, you look to me to be someone who is just coming across for a job and a better education for your kids, so I am going to let you come by. But you, you look like someone who might be coming across to do us great harm. No, of course, we cannot do that. I mean, even if we tried, the ACLU would go crazy and call it racial profiling or something. So we cannot do that. We either defend our borders or we do not.

Either walk away from this and stop putting our Border Patrol, or Forest Service people, our Park Service employees, our Customs agents, stop putting them in jeopardy of their lives for a principle one is not willing to uphold. One or the other, Mr. President and Mr. Speaker, one or the other. Uphold the law or abandon the law, repeal the law. Those are our choices. But this half-baked approach is the worst possible way to deal with it.

And I will suffer the slings and arrows of an angry media and of angry constituents and of angry members of the Hispanic and immigrant communities in the United States, although I must say, Mr. Speaker, that we get many, many supportive e-mails and calls and letters from Hispanic Americans who consider themselves to be Americans only, Americans. No hyphenated part in there, and they are worried about this country's survival, and they are worried about the effects of massive immigration, legal and illegal, and they support this position. It has got nothing to do with ethnicity. I said this a thousand times if I said it once. It has got nothing to do with the countries of origin. We are talking about whether or not we are in fact a sovereign State or whether we are not, and if we choose not to be, if we choose to go the route of the European Union and begin the process of eliminating borders, creating common currency and all that, that is okay as long as it is done as a result of a legal process. It is called this body. We vote on it. We make a decision on behalf of our constituents. That is the way it should be done. It should not be done in a de facto way, just having it happen and then 10 years from now we say, "Gee, how did this occur? Remember when there used to be an actual border between Canada and the United States and Mexico and the United States? Remember when we used to ask people flying in for visas and things like that? I wonder why we do not do that any more. What has happened to the whole American experiment?"

So I guess I will continue to raise my voice in defense of the American experiment, in defense of the people who have come here over the last 250-odd years, who have come here seeking a better life, who have come here legally. I speak in defense of them. I speak in defense of all those folks who do not have the money to plead their case, I suppose, with the INS, but they are in line, they are following the rules, they are hoping that we will let them in and they will have a shot at the good life. God bless them, I say. God bless them. They are doing it the right way. And every time we slap them in the face, all I can say is I am sorry. It is rude, it is mean-spirited and it is ugly. Again, I tell them thank you for doing it the right way, for coming to the United States legally, welcome to the United States to everyone in this Nation who has come here the right way.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this issue eventually resolves itself so that our Nation is defended and that the idea of sovereignty is upheld and the hopes and dreams of millions of people seeking to come here will be fulfilled, seeking to come here legally.

SENATE—Wednesday, September 18, 2002

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m. and was called to order by the Honorable JACK REED, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Lloyd John Ogilvie, offered the following prayer:

Our gracious God, we praise You for the privilege of being alive. Thank You for the gift of breath. We breathe in Your peace and breathe out stress and worry. We feel our pulses beat reminding us of the gift of circulation. Our minds form the images of thought about the opportunities of this new day. We are grateful for our intellects, the education we've had in this free land, and the opportunity to think creatively today. You have created us with emotions so we could love, feel deeply for others, and rejoice in our friendship with You, our Creator and Friend. And so we accept this day as a gift and join the psalmist in exulting, Bless the Lord, O my soul and all that is within me bless His holy Name. Bless the Lord, O my soul and forget not all of his benefits!—Psalm 103:1. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable JACK REED led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. BYRD.)

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,

Washington, DC, September 18, 2002.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable JACK REED, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. REED thereupon assumed the Chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, there will be a period of morning business that will begin at 11:30 today, with the first half hour under the control of Senator DASCHLE and the second half under the control of Senator LOTT. We are now going to be back on the Interior appropriations bill. There is not a great deal that can be done because of the procedural quagmire in which we find ourselves because cloture was not invoked.

At 12:30 we will go off Interior and go back to the homeland security bill. At that time, Senator BYRD will be recognized to offer his amendment regarding the orderly transition of the new Department. Cloture was filed under the Lieberman substitute amendment to the Homeland Security Act. Because of this, all first-degree amendments will have to be filed prior to 1 p.m. today.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the leadership time is reserved.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 2003

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 5093, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5093) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 2003, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Byrd Amendment No. 4472, in the nature of a substitute.

Byrd Amendment No. 4480 (to Amendment No. 4472), to provide funds to repay accounts from which funds were borrowed for emergency wildfire suppression.

Craig/Domenici Amendment No. 4518 (to Amendment No. 4480), to reduce hazardous fuels on our national forests.

Dodd Amendment No. 4522 (to Amendment No. 4472), to prohibit the expenditure of funds to recognize Indian tribes and tribal nations until the date of implementation of certain administrative procedures.

Byrd/Stevens Amendment No. 4532 (to Amendment No. 4472), to provide for critical emergency supplemental appropriations.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ENZI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ENZI. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment introduced by my colleagues, Senators CRAIG and DOMENICI, that I feel is critical to the survival of many forests in Wyoming and across the rest of the United States.

This amendment gives the Secretaries of Agriculture and Interior the ability to recognize emergency conditions that exist on many of our forests and then allows land managers to act to protect them from the extreme threat of wildfire, specifically in those areas suffering from drought and high tree mortality resulting from insect infestation, disease, invasive plant species, or other catastrophic natural events. In other words, it allows our land management agencies to clean up their tinder boxes before they explode.

Wyoming is currently suffering its third year of drought, and our neighbor to the north, Montana, is in its fifth year. Colorado, to the south, had the driest 6 months on record from December to May. And South Dakota had the driest June on record.

More than half the United States is considered to be in drought conditions, and some estimates place this drought in the West to eventually be worse than the Dust Bowl years of the 1930s.

When these dry conditions combine with the dense fuel loads that exist in our National Forest System, we get a fire season that sets new records for intensity, for severity, and for extent. In fact, things are so hot and dry in Wyoming, we have considered outlawing corduroy pants.

Already, the 2002 fire season has burned more than 6,418,362 acres, or, in other words, 10,032 square miles, or—to put it a little differently—a 4-mile-wide strip from Washington, DC, to Los Angeles, CA. And that is packed into the Western States. This has already cost our Nation millions of dollars, and it will cost us millions more before the fire season is over.

Earlier this year, Forest Service Chief Dale Bosworth was forced to notify his forest supervisors that his agency expects to meet—and I would suggest it could even exceed—fire suppression costs spent during the historic 2000 fire season, where more than 8.4 millions acres burned, and we spent more than $1.3 billion. As was noted earlier, 2002 has already exceeded 2000's year to date acres burned. And in one recent fire—the Rodeo-Chediski fire in eastern Arizona—the Department of the Interior and the Federal Emergency Management Agency spent $8 million per day—$8 million per day—at its peak to fight it.

Forests need to be controlled locally. The local forester has the best idea of what is going on, and should have more control over the decisions. Local for-ester decisions is recognized in the Daschle emergency military spending amendment.

Forests have vast differences. Eastern forests are particularly different from western forests. People who have only seen eastern forests cannot rationally comment on health in a western forest. People of the East cannot understand how little moisture we get in the West.

Wyoming gets about an average of 16 inches of rain a year. I think we get that much per month out here, sometimes, in Washington. They do not understand the difference between drought in an arid area and drought in a rain forest. Because we have less moisture, the undervegetation is different and is dry. It is often pine needles and pine needles easily combust.

The West is mostly pine trees instead of hardwoods. The ground is steeply sloped. We have real mountains out in Wyoming, not the rolling hills we call mountains here in the East. So the ground is steeply sloped and it has ravines; those are small canyons. Some of them are pretty good-sized canyons.

Pines ignite easier than hardwoods because they are more porous and are dryer. The trees have needles instead of leaves. When bark beetles infect a pine tree, they kill the pine, but the needles do not drop off like leaves would drop off a normal tree. They dry out. They turn a rust color. And they stay on the tree for at least a year. They ignite even easier on the tree because the air can get to the needles. Even the bark on the trees is different. Hardwoods have a denser bark, which is harder to ignite. Pines have a bark that makes really good tinder. It peels off the tree pretty easily. Even controlled burns, prescribed burns—the burns that we set intentionally in the forests—can kill trees; and they do. Many of the prescribed burn fires that we have get out of control. These are such tinder boxes that they get out of control; they race through and kill the trees, not just the underbrush they are supposed to kill. And a lot of it has to do with the difference in trees.

If a beetle-killed pine is at the bottom of a hill, it easily fires up all the trees upslope from it. Fire burns up. The fire even creates a wind that moves the fire faster. If the tree happens to be in a sloping ravine—one of these canyons—the ravine creates a wind tunnel that amplifies the speed of the wind. The ravine provides a chimney effect that further dries the trees and warms them so they are more combustible, so they can explode.

To fight the fires, it is necessary to get the firefighters to the fire. If the fire starts to move fast, it is also necessary to be able to get the firefighters out quickly. We are eliminating roads in our forests, and we are definitely not building any new ones. Roads cannot be built during the fire, particularly in mountainous country.

Another difference with crown trees is they have a crown as opposed to the hardwood canopy of leaves. When a pine tree catches on fire, the flame burns to the point of the tree just like a candlewick. The last several feet of the tree is called the crown of the tree. When a wind is created by the burning trees, and the crown catches on fire, the crown can be separated from the tree and thrown. The wind will throw this crown a half mile to a mile, where it ignites another tree, usually at the top already, with that crown being thrown, and so on. So these fires can move extremely rapidly and set multiple fires in multiple areas.

There have been changes in western forests. Landscape comparisons, where we compare old photos with the same locations today, show us there are many more places with trees today than there were 50 and 100 years ago. And where there were trees, there used to be 50 trees to the acre—an acre is about the size of a football field—and, today, that same forest area has an average of 200 trees, and sometimes as many as 1,200 trees.

Trees are like most plants. If you plant too many, and you do not thin them, the growth of all of them will be stunted. Foresters have also found that pine beetles are more likely to attack trees that are always in shade.

Mr. President, 1,200 trees on an acre—the size of a football field—are going to be in shade just about all the time. Even 200 trees on an acre will be in shade all the time. Pine beetles like that. Trees always in shade are weaker and more susceptible to disease. And they are not as useful. They do not provide protection. And should we ever allow any to be cut down, they do not provide nearly the wood, either.

Trees are also alive. They have a lifespan. It is a tree lifespan, not a human lifespan, so it is often considerably longer, but not always. If we only keep old-growth trees, the forest will die of old age, and nothing will be left because they will all die at the same time, or approximately.

Why do we have more trees now? Because we do not have as many forest fires. Why don't we have more forest fires? Because we have more structures to protect. Why shouldn't we let fires that are distant from homes, then, burn to get rid of the excess trees?

First, it is a waste of product that could keep the price of homes down and even provide homes for people who never thought they would be a part of that American dream.

Second, an isolated fire that is allowed to burn becomes a huge wildfire and then is very difficult to put out. I will talk about that a little bit later. The bigger the fire, the harder it is to contain and the more dangerous it is to the lives of those fighting it.

Third, when "let it burn" really worked was only when the western population lived in tepees. They started a lot of fires. They started fires to make meadows for the wild game and to produce some plants that need more open space. But they lived in tepees. And when a fire started, they folded up their home and they moved out of range. When the fire was over, they found more beautiful land and they started again.

Today there isn't that flexibility of moving or of land availability. No one wants their home burned down. In fact, no one even wants to save their cabin if the only view they will have for the next 20 years is charred and limbless trees. Not only is the view ruined by a fire, but on the slopes we have out West, erosion starts.

A woman who owns a Montana logging firm—I love this—does the accounting and runs the skidder. That is small business, when you do all ends of the thing. She owns a Montana logging firm. Two years ago, during those terrible fires we had in 2000, she testified at a special hearing that Senator BURNS and Senator CRAIG held in Billings, MT. One of the big points she made was that there is a difference between what she does and what Mother Nature does, and it is primarily that her firm respects the rule banning timber activities within 400 feet from a stream. A fire burns right down to the stream, and so the erosion can go clear to the stream.

She also brought in a little bit of a sample of some wood. I should have brought it this morning—except we are not supposed to have three-dimensional items on the floor—to show what some of these diseased trees are like. It is a core of wood about that big around. It has pine beetles in it, but it still would make homes.

So the big difference between having a conscientious firm do the work and Mother Nature do the work is that the firm respects the 400 feet from the stream.

I recently ran across a book called "Fire on the Mountain." It is by John N. Maclean. Some of you are probably more familiar with his dad who wrote a book that became a movie called "A River Runs Through It." It has some great pictures of the West in there and some great fishing pictures as well. I recommend "A River Runs Through It." But for knowledge of fires, I recommend to everybody, even in cities, that they read "Fire on the Mountain," which is very well done. It is from 5 years' worth of research about a fire on Storm King Mountain in Colorado. It was in the south canyon and in sight of the I-70 interstate and Canyon Creek Estates. It happened on July 3, 1994, and resulted in the death of 14 firefighters, professional firefighters, ones who had heard about the fires like the one at Mann Gulch. These are people who know how fast these things can go but still have trouble believing it.

I want to read a couple of excerpts from this book because it will give us a little bit of an idea of what it is like when one of these pine forests catches on fire:

Bryan Scholz, the foreman, felt a pinprick of apprehension. He had seen the same thing a few weeks before, a routine brushfire on a steep slope, and that time the fire had exploded.

Further on:

"I told them what was going to happen," Scholz said. "The folks on the other crews were looking at me like I was some sort of knucklehead. And it happened. The fire made one huge run from bottom to top in a minute, probably a good half-mile square.

This is a drought year, Scholz told the crew. "Learn the lesson now, when we don't have to pay the price."

Another example of how these things work:

A backwash of embers swirled above the flames. If sparks from the backwash eddied down the slope and reach the opposite side of the western drainage, there would be fire on both sides of the gulch. That kind of fire creates its own wind. It turns small flames into a giant fireball, and the fireball races up the gulch faster than a man can run. That had been the story forty-five years earlier in Mann Gulch: A fireball had chased the smoke jumpers.

This is the progression of the fire. Incidentally, from Canyon Creek Estates they could see this little plume of smoke up the mountain that was just a little plume of smoke for 3 days. Nobody paid any attention, except to worry that it could turn into a big fire.

Continuing with an excerpt:

A jet of flame shot upward and then another, seeming to spring from nowhere. Piles of dead brush, branches and tree trunks ignited. Living brush, tinder-dry from drought, took fire. Darts of flame transformed into bonfires, which merged into a single, expanding flame front. A booming wind raced up the western drainage and struck the flames, pressing the telltale smoke column nearly flat to the ground.

Muscular strands of scarlet flame appeared through the smoke. The fire drew back to renew itself, taking in oxygen, and the smoke covered the flames; then the fire surged forward, and again ribbons of flame came into view.

The rapid transition of a fire burning in debris and litter to one involving all available fuel, from the ground to the tops of trees. But this falls short of describing the majesty of the occasion.

A blowup is one of nature's most powerful forces, equivalent to a mighty storm, avalanche or volcanic eruption. It can sweep away in moments everything before it, the works of nature and of humankind, and sometimes humankind itself. It is destructive, but neither good nor evil; it goes where wind and terrain take it.

Blowups happen every fire season across the West when wind, fuel, dryness and terrain come together in the right combination and meet with a spark. The blowup stokes itself by creating its own wind, the hear drawing cooler air by convection. If it happens in a gulch, as is common, the sides of the gulch—in this case the western drainage—act as a chimney and compress its energy. The flaming tempest can send a smoke column to a height of forty thousand feet or more. The blowup may die out once the gulch is burned or move on and reduce thousands of acres to ash. The blowing-up, in any case, is over in minutes.

Flames also made downhill leaps as wind eddies scattered sparks toward the bottom of the V. The eddies carried aloft fistfuls of burning duff, decayed leaves, that is, twigs and other matter.

... the gorge of the Colorado River, a natural wind funnel, in a phenomenon known as a venturi effect, named for the nineteenth-century physicist G. B. Venturi, who discovered that a throatlike, constricted tube actually will increase the velocity of fluids—

That is what these ravines do and what the river adds to.

The transition from a "normal" fire to a blowup took seconds.

I have to tell you, when the fire was out, the trouble wasn't over. The fire happened in July. In September—September 1—a motorist was driving through heavy rain on I-70. That is the interstate visible from where the fire was, the fire that killed 14 people who were not able to get out of the way of how fast that fire raced through this tinder dry fuel.

On September 1, a motorist, driving through heavy rain on I-70 past the foot of Storm King, heard "a whoosh like a real strong wind going through the mountains." Hundreds of tons of mud, blackened trees, and scorched brush, loosened as a result of the fire, slid down gullies, spilled across I-70, and poured into the Colorado River. The mud engulfed 30 vehicles. Traffic on I-70 was backed up for 4 miles.

Several people and vehicles were swept into the river. Two people were injured, but [fortunately] no one was killed.

That is the aftermath effect of a forest fire. That is another reason we are trying to stop forest fires, particularly in these mountainous areas. They destroy the mountain.

Now, so far we have been lucky that some of our most dangerous areas haven't caught fire. We have not been lucky in deaths caused by the forest fires. I think we are up to 22 deaths so far caused by the forest fires this year alone. Not all of those could have been avoided, but many could have been avoided by having healthy forests.

We really need a discussion in this country about what a healthy forest is. We have to move away from thinking one side wants every tree cut down and the other side wants no trees cut down. We have to get to where we are thinking about the health of the forests and the beauty we want our kids to be able to see in several years.

One of the areas I am particularly concerned about is just east of Cody, WY, on Shoshone National Forest. It lies right next to Yellowstone National Park. This is an area considered critical habitat for wolves, grizzlies, whooping cranes, elk, bison, mule deer, and several other animals that spend their time living in Yellowstone National Park when the snows get deep in Wyoming. The area is also home to a very severe pine beetle infestation that threatens to ignite and cause extreme damage to the park, the forest, and the surrounding communities.

This summer, the National Forest Foundation—these are individuals who believe in putting their money where their mouth is. They put money into a foundation and, occasionally, they get matching money. They do pilot projects that allow experiments to be done in forests to make them as healthy as possible. I want to challenge any environmental group out there to share with me their numbers on how much of the money they collect goes to actually solving the problem they are talking about—not going into court actions to stop other people from doing anything, but actually working on the problem they are talking about. I highly congratulate the National Forest Foundation for putting their money where their mouth is. I got to see some of these projects which have created habitat, primarily for elk, and where most importantly they were able to drive down the fire danger, making some beautiful areas in Wyoming, getting rid of these rust-colored abominations that we have.

A year ago there was a fire in Yellowstone Park. I went to that fire. I wanted to see how the new fire plan was working. I have to tell you that every firefighter I talked to was thankful that we have a policy now of stopping the burn as fast as we can. We used to have a policy of let it burn, and then when it started getting in the area of structures, we started to worry about it. Often the flames were maybe as high as 150 feet, and we could not do anything about it. So they really like this new policy. It is much safer for them to go in as soon as the fire starts and put it out.

On the Storm King fire, as I mentioned, they noticed flame from these Canyon Creek Estates on July 3, and it was 3 days later before anybody went to take care of the fire. It was just a small plume of smoke quite a ways from homes. In a matter of a few minutes, it turned and became a danger to those homes. People living at the bottom of one of these areas are not very pleased to have a fire going alongside their homes, even if it is quite distant.

They showed me some of their maps and, from where we were, we could actually see what they were talking about. They were concentrating 80 percent of their fire suppression efforts on one small part of Yellowstone Park, right at the edge of the park. The reason they were doing that was there was this big pine beetle infestation next to that. If the fire were to have jumped from Yellowstone into the infestation, it would have taken out the lodges and homes and the Boy Scout camp between there and the reservoir near Cody. They had meetings with people in the lodges and in the homes and made sure they had an evacuation plan.

If you are a tourist in a lodge, and the owner of the lodge is explaining the forest fire evacuation plan to you, it doesn't make a very relaxing vacation. When you go home, you don't say: There is this great place outside of Yellowstone I would like you to visit, but you have to watch out for forest fire evacuations.

At any rate, the firefighters there wanted to know what I was going to do about removing those pine beetle trees because they are a huge danger to the forest. Nobody wants to drive through charred trees to get to Yellowstone Park. There are trees that need to be taken out. They run through some ravines. What I talked about could actually happen with the area just outside of Yellowstone Park. Fortunately, we have the National Forest Foundation making some headway at getting a little bit of corrective work there. But it is nothing compared to what we need.

Another example can be found in the Black Hills National Forest, where forest managers have been extremely lucky not to have to deal with fires in the Beaver Park roadless area or the Norbeck Wildlife Preserve. These areas are suffering from severe storm-related damage and a mountain pine beetle infestation that has left acres of dead and dying trees. When trees are filled with dense and now dry underbrush, it creates a terminal condition for the entire ecosystem should something happen and a fire start in either of these areas. As I said earlier, we have been lucky these areas have not already caught fire.

One fire did get close. The Deadwood fire came within a mile and a half of these areas. It also burned down some structures. I have to give you a report on that because, most recently, there has been a huge mud slide there. Mother Nature didn't observe some of our federal rules limiting erosion.

Fortunately, the Senator from South Dakota, Mr. DASCHLE, was able to include language in the emergency supplemental military bill that will allow the Black Hills National Forest to address this situation. If we are lucky, it will be done in a timely manner and before it is too late. I only hope we can provide that same kind of protection for the areas in Wyoming and the other Western States.

Back when I was a Boy Scout, one of the requirements I had to complete to earn the rank of first class on my way to earning the Eagle Scout Award was to start a campfire using not more than two matches. I became very good at starting campfires and was well known for winning water-boiling contests at scout camporees. There are a number of tricks people develop in starting campfires. I had my own system that helped me to win. But no matter who you are, or what your trick may be, there are three basic elements to every fire—oxygen, fuel, and heat.

Oxygen comes from the air and is readily available. Fuel is found in the wood, particularly dry wood that burns easily when enough heat is applied. Heat comes from a spark, match, possibly friction—not corduroy pants, however. We cannot do anything about oxygen. The fuel—we can do and should do something about fuel. Usually, we cannot do anything about heat unless it is manmade.

The best way to apply enough heat to start a successful campfire is to properly organize the wood in a way that allows flames to climb from the bottom of the firepit where you put the smaller, quick-burning sticks and tinder—to the larger, longer burning logs in much the same way as someone would climb a ladder one rung at a time. Some of you have fireplaces. That is the way you do it. You put in the small tinder and then bigger and then the logs, which you like to see burn—you don't if it is a forest fire.

To start a successful fire, I began by carefully putting the wood shavings at the bottom of the fire—this would be my light tinder, or the first rung of the fire ladder. I then built a small teepee of sticks over my tinder—about the same as a ravine—and I added larger sticks, which is what catches fire when everything else happens. The larger pieces of wood go on the top. They draw the heat from the flames of the intermediate sticks below them. If you did it correctly, you would start your fire and boil a can of water before anybody else.

What does this have to do with our national forests? If you go out on the ground now and look at the density of our national forests, they are laid out just like the campfires I was trained to build when I was a Boy Scout. At the bottom of every forest lies a collection of small dried out brush, leaves, and fallen bark. Over this pile of tinder is the next rung, which is made up of small to intermediate trees. These intermediate trees are then crowded in between the larger and older trees that make up the top rung, or crown, of the forest fuels ladder.

This problem wasn't always as bad as it is now. There was a time when Mother Nature and the Native Americans took care of thinning the forests by regularly starting wildfires. Because the fuel loads weren't allowed to grow as dense as they are today, the fuel ladder didn't reach all the way to the big trees. Fire would burn up the tinder and thin out the intermediate and dead and dying trees. This promoted biodiversity, kept the intensity of the forests down, and in times of drought the competition for limited water resources was dramatically less than it is today.

We now have forests that historically had 40 or 50 tree stems per acre that are now over 200 stems per acre. That is a 300-percent increase.

When a fire starts in forests this dense, it quickly climbs the fuel ladders and races out of control. These crown fires are all but impossible to stop. The heat generated from all rungs burning at once sterilizes the soil and leaves nothing but desolation in its wake. This is only made worse with the added factor of drought.

By adding to the mix stands of dead trees that are as dry and volatile as the tinder on the forest floor, one can imagine the threat this kind of fire can have on the forests and their surrounding communities, and there are more and more communities, more and more homes, more and more structures.

It is a much better conservation practice, therefore, to step in and duplicate the effect historic, healthy fires had on our forests by using what we call mechanical thinning. This is a practice where our land management agencies hire experienced timber companies to remove the dense underbrush and carry out the smaller and intermediate trees, thereby leaving a forest that is healthy, more biodiverse, more fire resilient and that has a better mix of older and younger trees so the whole forest does not die off at once.

The alternative is to allow Mother Nature to step in and conduct one of her catastrophic clearcuts, and when Mother Nature does a clearcut, as I already mentioned, she does not care about riparian zones or raptor nesting sites.

Another factor that must also be considered, now that we are fighting the war on terror, is that these catastrophic clearcuts we are suffering in the West also pose a serious threat to our national security. It requires an extreme amount of resources and time to fight these fires and often includes military support. The Air National Guard facilities in Wyoming have been detailed as a support base for dispatching air tankers, and a lot of our Nation's airspace is now off limits to anyone but firefighting aircraft.

We also have a report that the fires pose a serious threat to our Nation's communications facilities and to the power grid. There is no way to build an extensive communication and power system in the West without putting some of it on Federal public lands, including forests. The Federal Government is the largest landowner in the West, and we have rights of way crossing all over it. When we have fires such as we have this year, they are, at one time or another, going to threaten our Nation's utilities.

We cannot afford in this day and age to surrender our Nation's greatest assets in fighting the war on terror; namely, its technological advantage created by our extensive energy and communications networks.

In closing, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this amendment and in giving our Federal land managers the tools they need to decrease the serious threat of fire on our forests caused by the dangerous combination of drought and infestation. It is a very limited bill. I would even hesitate to call it a pilot project. But it is essential to get started and to get started now. If we can establish some good examples, we can show there can be healthy, beautiful forests, the way we envisioned them and dreamed of our kids and our grandkids and our great-grandkids being able to see them. We have to have better stewardship of our forests than what we are doing right now, and it does include cutting some trees.

I thank the Chair. I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, for the last good number of minutes, I have been listening to the Senator from Wyoming talk about forest fires in the making. I must tell you, it was not only fascinating but an issue he and I, as westerners who live in forested States, have grown to develop some knowledge about over the years.

I liken Senator ENZI's speech to Forest Fire 101. It was appropriate, and it well defines the great problems we face, not just in the West today, although conifer trees—or pine trees, fir trees, all that the Senator was speaking about—have a different characteristic in fire than do the broadleaves.

What is fascinating to me now is that in January, February, and March, which oftentimes are the dryer seasons on the Eastern seaboard, we are beginning to see more and more fires in our broadleaf forests because of the fuel loading that is occurring. It starts in the brush and in the leaf flora and goes to trees that are not yet leafed out and green.

The point I make, and why we are talking about this as a national fire policy and why it is important for the Senate to stop, as we have, to focus on the need to reshape public policy in this critical area, is it is now of national importance and a magnitude we have never seen before.

We are not used to allocating $2 billion a year of taxpayers' resources to fight fires. That is approximately what we are going to be doing this year. It is what we did last year and the year before. The American public ought to be scratching their heads a bit and asking a fundamental question of their policymakers: Is that justifiable? Can we, as a country, spend $2 billion a year to fight fire in our national forests? Why are we doing it?

As I have mentioned several times, it is not any longer just to put out fires that are burning trees and watershed and wildlife habitat. It is to protect an ever-growing number of homes that are built near or in these forested areas because that has become an extremely popular place to live for the average American over the course of the last number of years.

In 1998, we had some very severe fires in Idaho, and in an area with which I am very familiar—which is where I grew up—in the McCall-Cascade area of the national forest—the forest supervisor of the Payette at that time told me—and I think we lost 200,000 to 250,000 acres in two or three fires that joined together that year—that the greatest concern he had and the most resources he used was to keep fire away from homes; that while the fires had to be left to burn elsewhere because they simply did not have the manpower to put them out, they focused on protecting homes.

We now call that the urban wildland interface. Over the course of the last several years, we have tried to shape fire policy around that and direct resources toward the thinning and cleaning of forests in the immediate areas around these lovely homes that are being built out in the wooded areas.

Is that a national responsibility, is that a Federal responsibility, or is that the responsibility of the homeowner? The homeowner builds his or her home next to a national forest anticipating that forest is cared for and is not going to erupt in fire and, therefore, will not place their home at risk. So this is a public obligation, in part, to sustain a healthy forest, not just for wildlife habitat and watershed but to assure that fires will not sweep across private land and destroy private property. There is, at least arguably, a liability factor there if the forests are not properly maintained.

Over time, we have said there is a liability factor if the poor management of product on one side of a property line causes damage to property on the other side of a property line. Out West, we say if you harbor noxious weeds on one side of a property line and they move over to your neighbor's property, you are liable. County law and State law says so.

That is why we have dedicated phenomenal resources over the last number of years, as this fire situation has grown in our forested areas, to protecting homes. Even as we try to protect the home, as the Senator from Wyoming has so clearly spelled out, in this fiscal year, starting in mid-June, we have lost now over 2,100 homes across this country, mostly along the Rocky Mountain front from the White Mountain forests of Arizona up through the Rocky Mountain forests of Colorado, homes in California, a few in Oregon, an entire town almost wiped out in Arizona, and an entire community threatened in Oregon this year with severe fire.

It is appropriate, while the Senate would wish to rush on to other issues, that we deal with this issue in some form. It is a national crisis. Nowhere can we say that the loss of 6.5 million acres of our forested lands is anything but a crisis. As I have said, if this had been Hurricane Andrew—and I am not sure Andrew did much more damage than that years ago in Florida—we would rush down there with all possible Federal resources to help the community, to turn the power on, to rebuild the homes, to clean up the debris.

Here we step back and say—or at least some do—this is all but an act of nature in a normal sense. It is not an act of nature to see abnormal fires of the kind the Senator from Wyoming has spoken so clearly about, with heat intensities in a multiple of hundreds of degrees hotter than a normal fire, burning everything in its path, leaving nothing behind. That is not a normal forest fire. That is an abnormal forest fire that is a creation of public policy that has disallowed the thinning and cleaning by mankind that was once done by fire, before we eliminated fire from the ecosystem about 90 to 100 years ago.

We became extremely active in fire management in a post-World War II era when a bunch of young men came home who had learned how to jump out of airplanes. They could put a shovel and a pulaski on their back and file in a Ford trimotor out across the forests of the West and jump off to a lightning strike and throw a few shovels of dirt on it and put it out and they became known as smoke jumpers. That was the beginning of a scenario on our western public land forests to put fire out. We got better and better at it over the years, to the point where we have nearly eliminated the fires, and in eliminating fire, which was the natural cleanser of our forests at that time, we did not replace it with a fire-like, man-created presence.

So the fuels begin to build and the small trees begin to grow and the brush begins to multiply to the point we have added fuels to the acres of such magnitude that scientists tell us that they are fuels equivalent in Btu's to tens of thousands of gallons of gasoline per acre in explosive character or ignitable capability. That is the reality of many of these public land forests today.

In the White Forests of Arizona, where 100 years ago stood 25 trees per acre in a relatively pastoral setting, with grass growing beneath, wildlife ambling through, large trees scattered across the landscape, in that very forest this June, instead of 25 or 30 trees per acre, there were 700 trees per acre—not big trees, little ones, 6 to 8 inches through. A forester would call those weed trees, scrub trees, of no value, except to do exactly what the Senator from Wyoming said—create that ignition of fire that starts from the bottom and sweeps upward to the crown of the tree along the natural coning shape of a conifer, a fir, a spruce, or a pine.

It is the characteristic of fire that we do not want to speak to today. We just want to ignore it because some groups have said it is natural, leave it alone, turn your back on it, walk away. They want to because they do not want us in there. It has been in the name of the environment. You cannot call this anything but now an environmental disaster, a total wipeout of the watershed. You heard the Senator from Colorado last night talk about it.

Now, in Durango, CO, where the land burned but 2½ months ago, the rains have now come and the land is sliding down the mountainside and blocking the streams and the roads and filling the reservoirs full of muddy ash and water. That is not natural. Had that watershed in the Durango area that feeds Denver been allowed to be thinned, cleaned, alive and vibrant, fire would not have burned it. The rains would have come. The organic soils would have consumed the water and slowly allowed them to trickle down that watershed into the lakes and reservoirs that feed the Greater Denver area and its water systems.

Absent that is nothing but a tragedy. To say that is only a natural occurrence and that somehow we have to accept it is wrong. To the environmentalists who make that argument, I say, shame on you. You ought to become a copartner in working with us to determine how we can effectively thin and clean and restore the health and vibrancy and environmental integrity of those watersheds so they can support wildlife habitat and become the ever-replenishing source of water for the urban areas of the West or anywhere else in our country.

Our forests are important to our ecosystem. They are great sequesters of carbon that flows out of the air as a result of the human presence and great storehouses of water that then feed out over the course of a year, to be used by all of us for life-sustaining purposes, not to slide down mountains in the form of mud and ash and broken, burned trees, of a kind that you will now see all over the West this winter in those 6.5 million acres that have already burned. It is a disaster that has happened.

To not stand here on the floor and shout out about it would be a failure of anyone who represents those areas. It is not natural. It is a creation or a result of public policy that has allowed that.

I am suggesting we not look backwards and start pointing fingers and blame, but we look forward. We know the conditions today. We know the problem. We also know a solution. And every forest scientist will line up and tell you exactly what to do. Most all of them will agree. It is not clearcutting. It is not logging. It is not all of the kinds of things that some accuse us of wanting to do. It is a systematic cleaning and thinning and restoring of health, and replacing fire with man's presence in a fire-like way. By that, I mean the thinning, cleaning process.

No, I am going to be an advocate of green sales, and I will be an advocate of a logging program as a part of a multiple use base of our national forests, but that is a different argument and a separate issue from the issue of forest health. When we have hundreds of millions of acres of forests across our Nation today, and we know there are over 94 million acres that are in some form of health problems, and there are nearly 30 million that are at crisis today by big kill of the kind that the Senator from Wyoming spoke of, by dead and dying trees, by magnitudes of large fuel loading that creates the kindling of the fires that swept across and are continuing to burn in the West today, that is where we ought to focus. That is where we are focusing with the Craig-Domenici amendment. It is why we have invited all of our colleagues to become involved and help us work out these problems, instead of simply saying no, because some special interest group said, tell them no.

This is not an answer today in the West. No means we will continue to burn. And every year we will burn 5 or 6 or 7 million acres—every year for the next 10 years, 20 years, 30 years. That is a magnitude of environmental disaster of the kind this country has never seen. It is one of which I do not want to be a part; it is one the Senator from Wyoming does not want to be a part. It is why we are working so hard to strike a compromise, to make a small step forward, to change the thinking just a little bit. It is why the Craig-Domenici amendment selects urban wildlife interface, municipal watersheds, and an unlimited number of those 30 million acres of the critical dead and dying—less than 10 million acres in total.

We have said, let us make this small step forward and watch the U.S. Forest Service—bring the cameras in—prove we can thin and we can clean and we can reestablish the health of these forests. And it is not by someone also's definition of logging. That it is not evil and clandestine and somehow a subterfuge to get loggers back into the woods. There is nothing wrong with loggers in the woods, nothing wrong at all. But this is not that issue. This is a forest health issue. If we do the right logging in the right areas and we sustain ourselves, we can always have a healthy forest. But today we ignore it.

The last 3 years I fought the effort of the former President, President Clinton, to lock up 94 million acres of roadless lands. I guess it was about 1994. We succeeded in stopping him. But he wanted to lock it up, again at the advice of some interest groups, and then ask America to simply turn their back on it and let it sit.

That is where all these fires are starting today. Many of the fires that started in the roadless class 3 lands today are the ones that swept out of those, into class 2 and class 1 high-quality forest lands, and wiped everything out in the process. Because fires of the kind the Senator from Wyoming spoke about know no bounds. The Senator said it: All they know is heat, fuel, oxygen. And in a drought-like environment where humidity is dramatically low, kindling points drop dramatically and forests literally do explode.

Those who have seen the great forest fires of the West, have seen the devastation, have seen the plumes of smoke going 12,000, 14,000, 20,000 feet into the air and mushrooming like an atomic bomb, will never forget what they saw.

When the White Forests were burning this year, I was flying from Dallas to Denver. Somewhere out over northwestern New Mexico we began to hit the cloud plume and the smoke rolling off the fires in Arizona. The pilot came on the intercom—we were at 35,000 feet, and the airplane was in smoke—and he said to the passengers on the plane: As a pilot, I have never experienced this before, but we are in the smoke from the forest fires of Arizona.

We were in smoke from that time, as that plane flew out of New Mexico, across Arizona, and into Colorado, until we landed in Denver and then the winds had shifted; Denver had cleared, but from Denver south, it was all full of smoke.

But to have an airline pilot say he had never experienced that, to me, is a simple description of the magnitude of these fires, the intensity of them, the phenomenal fuel consumption, the tremendous release of carbon into the air, that smoke cloud that literally spread across the United States at high altitude.

That is the crisis to which we speak. Some would like to rush to judgment, ignore these problems, walk away from them. Shame on us if we do. Shame on us if we do not work to make one small step toward correcting these problems. If we then, by that small step, can prove to the American public that we have done the right thing—and I think we will be able to—then will they allow us to make another step? I hope that is the case. That is what we are going to try to get accomplished, and I think we can get that accomplished today. I hope we can.

What I would appreciate, if we are wrong, is to have the opposition come speak on the floor and tell us why we are wrong. I have heard no one come to the floor this year and try to justify the fires that have burned across America's public forests this year. In fact, they are cowering in the smoke, wishing not to speak out. They will vote for the special interests that ask them to vote no, but they will not come out and openly express that what happened in Arizona and Colorado and California this year, and parts of Oregon, is all but a natural process and 2,100 homes and 22 or 25 lives and $2 billion is an acceptable reality to America's forest environment.

I do not believe that is the case. So, if you can't justify the current policy and the current policy is creating that kind of damage, then why not change it just a little bit, enough to prove to the American people, and to the critics, that what we are advocating is the right and proper direction? Give us the time to do the programs, turn the television cameras on, come out and look at it, and tell America what we are doing. If it is wrong, we will change it. But I think they will be very surprised, finding out we can thin and we can clean and we can improve the watersheds and you can save the forests and you can defuel them and therefore fireproof them—at least from the kinds of fires the Senator from Wyoming and I have been discussing—and allow these forests to return, in some instances, to the natural fires of 100 years ago that burned lightly and ambled across the land, thinning and cleaning but not destroying and not burning large trees or the pastoral landscape that Europeans first experienced when they landed on these soils and began to trek across this great continent and through these marvelous forests from east to west.

It is a legacy. The legacy of today is a legacy of embarrassment, in my opinion. It is a legacy of misguided public policy that has brought us to a point of decision. We ought not take it lightly. We certainly ought to deal with it now rather than later.

I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. STABENOW). The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. ENZI. Madam President, I thank the Senator from Idaho for his kind comments but more so for his leadership he is providing on this issue. The speech he gave now and the several speeches he has given, I know they have been extemporaneous and from the heart and contain a lot of information that people across this country need to have.

I congratulate you for your leadership. I also congratulate Senator BURNS, Senator DOMENICI, and Senator ALLARD from Colorado for their leadership on this.

Yes, it is interesting there are not some speeches against what we are doing. We had an interesting vote on the floor yesterday. We had a cloture vote. We had a vote to stop discussion, not on this amendment but on the one that is just above it in the food chain. The purpose of that cloture vote was to keep us from getting a vote on having healthy forests in this country.

I don't want people to think we are filibustering. We are trying to get a vote. We want a vote. But there are all kinds of tactics being used to stop us from getting a vote on whether we ought to have healthy forests, because everybody in this body knows how everybody in this body ought to vote on healthy forests. They ought to vote for them.

We need a lot more dialog on what a healthy forest is. I admit that. I want to point out the amendment we are talking about is not even of significance to be a pilot project. It has virtually wiped out the chance to really do the job in our forests. But it does give us a chance to start showing what could be done in the forests. It is a shame anybody thinks that is worth stopping—just a small, pilot project.

I did have a couple of other thoughts as the Senator from Idaho was speaking. We have covered quite a bit about what a waste fire is. It brings to mind a little controversy that was happening at the time I came to the Senate, and that was a discussion about timbering. There was a discussion about how we were doing the timbering in this country below cost.

I am the only accountant in the Senate. I love looking at numbers. So when somebody starts talking about below-cost timber sales, that is in my category, that is something in which I am interested. So I took a look, to see how much it was costing us, as American taxpayers, to have timbering in the national forests. I saw some of the greatest gymnastics of accounting I have ever seen. We are taking corporations apart right now for their bad accounting—and they should be, if they are doing it wrong. But, by golly, somebody ought to take a look at the Government accounting while they are at it. They ought to take a look at timbering and the terrible accounting that was done on that.

You know, you really should not be able to take all of the costs of a national forest, which include a whole variety of different things and are supposed to include a whole variety of different activities, some of which are recreation. Did you know that recreation has costs? We provide a lot of services to people who are recreating in the national forests, and we should. But we should not take those costs of recreating and charge them to timbering, to show that it is a bad deal.

Let me tell you what kind of a bad deal we have going right now. Right now, we are talking about hiring a whole bunch of Federal employees to go in and clean up forests. There is a whole bunch of people out there who are already experienced at doing this. Yes, if you go back a few years in the methods they use, you can question some of those methods. We need to make sure those methods never happen again. But there is a right way to do it, and there are people out there who know the right way to do it, and do it the right way. Instead of having to pay for the whole job and throwing away whatever is taken out of the forests, they would pay for that right to cut out some of this dead timber.

Some of this has already happened, over by Rapid City. The forests come right up over against the city, and they were worried about it burning the city up, so they hired some people to come in and do some logging. They hired another crew to come in and clean out the underbrush. The ones who did the logging were from a little town in Wyoming. They were from Sheridan, WY. Do you know what they had to say to me when they found out that a second crew came in to clean out the underbrush after they did the logging? They said: We could have done both jobs for almost the same cost because the setting up costs money.

We are doing some really poor stewardship things in this country by not having a great dialog and getting the people involved who know how to do the things, because they have done them. There are jobs out there that could be done with credits for the lumber that might be usable. I have to tell you a little bit about the lumber that might be usable.

It used to be that you had to have a pretty big tree to get anything usable for housing. There is an innovative company in Sheridan, WY, I learned about after the problem over by Rapid City. They are able to take the core of small trees and laminate them together to make beams for houses, 2 by 4's for houses, tabletops. They have some phenomenal ingenuity, and they have some products that will be released shortly—again, with bits and pieces of very small trees. These are small businesses.

I am really proud of small businesses in this country because I know that is where the ingenuity of the Nation comes from. If a company gets a really good idea, they may be bought out by a bigger company. The start of these ideas usually comes from one person having a great idea, being willing to put their money where their mouth is, take on all the risks for it, and prove that the product will work. We have several of those very small operations in Wyoming. You can take almost anything you can call wood and put it to use in something that will drive down housing costs and make some beautiful features. We need to be doing that. As I mentioned, they are paid to cut the trees, but they are paid to clean up the forests. So if you want to save a little bit of money, put people to work, and make sure we don't have the terrible waste because of fires, that is how we can do it.

I hope everyone will support this amendment. It is not the amendment I would offer. It is far too small. It doesn't begin to take care of the problem. But I ask that you support the amendment and consider all of these things we have been saying. At least give some counterarguments, if there are any counterarguments. When we do these cloture amendments which are designed to eliminate this amendment without a vote, I hope everybody will continue to oppose that too.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MILLER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to speak as if in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOMELAND SECURITY

Mr. MILLER. Madam President, very shortly we will be back on the subject of homeland security. As this debate on homeland security goes on, I hope no one will forget that it is being held in the shadows of the fallen towers of the World Trade Center.

The smoldering fires may have gone out, the acrid smell may no longer burn our nostrils, the strains of "Amazing Grace" from the bagpipes may no longer fill the air, but, make no mistake about it, the need to protect this country and prevent this from ever happening again is just as urgent.

How does the Senate meet this, one of the greatest challenges of our time? I will tell you.

We talk and talk and talk. Then we pause to go out on the steps of the Capitol to sing "God Bless America" with our best profile to the camera. Then we come back inside and show our worst profile to the country.

I have not seen many cloture resolutions I did not like. I can't remember the last time I voted against one because I am almost always in favor of speeding things up around here.

Too often, the Senate reminds me of Will Shakespeare's words:

Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day.

But the cloture vote that is before us now is one that I cannot support. We have wasted so many precious days, days that we could ill afford to waste, days that gave our enemies more time to plot their next attack. And now, all of a sudden, we want to invoke cloture to stop the debate in its tracks.

Well, I will vote "no." Because, make no mistake about it, invoking cloture will prevent this Senate from having a choice, a choice between a bill the President will sign and one that he will veto.

We must give the President the flexibility to respond to terrorism on a moment's notice. He has to be able to shift resources, including personnel, at the blink of an eye.

So why do we hold so dear a personnel system that was created in 1883 and is as outdated as an ox-cart on an expressway?

I will tell you why. Because by keeping the status quo, there are votes to be had and soft money to be pocketed. That is the dirty little secret.

When the civil service was established well over a century ago, it had a worthy goal—to create a professional work force that was free of political cronyism.

Back then, it was valid. But too often in government we pass laws to fix the problems of the moment and then we keep those laws on the books for years and years without ever following up to see if they are still needed.

The truth of the matter is that a solution from the 19th century is posing a problem in the 21st, especially when this country is threatened in such a different and sinister way.

Presently, we are operating under a system of governmental gout and personnel paralysis.

Despite its name, our civil service system has nothing to do with civility. It offers little reward for good workers. It provides lots of cover for bad workers.

Hiring a new federal employee can take 5 months—5 months. Firing a bad worker takes more than a year—if it is even allowable—because of the mountains of paper work, hearings, and appeals.

A Federal worker caught drunk on the job can't be fired for 30 days, and then he has the right to insist on endless appeals.

Productivity should be the name of the game. And we lose productivity when bad folks hold onto jobs forever or when jobs go unfilled for months.

It is no wonder there is resentment among out many good employees. I would be resentful, too, if I watched bad workers kept on the payroll and given the same pay raises by managers who are intimidated by the complicated process of firing or even disciplining them.

A few years ago, there was a best selling book entitled, "The Death of Common Sense," written by a man named Phillip Howard.

I liked it so well and thought it was so on target that I gave all my agency heads a copy and had them read it. Then, I had Mr. Howard come to Georgia and speak to all of them.

Its thesis was that "universal requirements that leave no room for judgment are almost never fair, even when the sole point is to assure fairness," to use his very words. It is still very timely and even more pertinent to the Federal Government than to State government.

President Bush has called his efforts to bring security to our Nation and justice to our enemies a "relentless march."

This Senator is ready to fall into formation with our President's "relentless march."

Because when it comes to protecting the jobs of Federal workers or protecting the lives of American citizens, I know where I stand.

This is a country with 8,500 miles of border; a country that 500 million people enter each year; a country where 16 million containers a year enter our ports from foreign countries, and where more than 1.2 million international flights occur.

The daunting task of securing this country is almost incomprehensible. Let's not make it more difficult by tying this President's hands and the hands of every President who comes after him.

Why are some automatically assuming that the folks who will run this Department will abuse their positions and mistreat Federal employees?

Instead of assuming the worst, why aren't we seeking to create the strongest, most efficient Department we can create?

And don't forget this: Many previous Presidents—beginning with President John F. Kennedy—have found it necessary to exempt agencies from unionization and collective bargaining systems when it was in the interest of national security.

Dozens of Federal agencies are currently not covered by the Federal Labor Management Relations Act: the CIA, the FBI, the Secret Service, the air marshals within the FAA, and the list goes on. And yet the tens of thousands of employees in these agencies have been treated fairly and well.

Today, there are some 800 pages in the Federal Code that already generously guarantee rights, benefits and protections for employees—800 pages worth.

Now, I respect and thank the many good, hard-working Federal employees. And I have tried to imagine myself in these workers' places at this particular time in history.

I am an old believer in that line by that wonderful Georgia songwriter, Joe South, "Before you abuse, criticize or accuse, walk a mile in my shoes."

But perhaps it is because I have worked for $3 a day and was glad to have a job that I find their union bosses' refusal to budge for the greater good of this country so surprising.

Union politics may be important, but it should never take the place of national security. We are at a most serious time in the history of this land. Our country, our people are in mortal danger.

And as I look at what is transpiring around me, this old history teacher cannot help but think about what the timid and indecisive Neville Chamberlain was told by a Member of Parliament as he was being dismissed as the Prime Minister of Great Britain. "You have sat too long for the good that you have done," the Member told him. "You have sat too long for the good that you have done."

I am sorry to say it, but on this question of homeland security, I believe that most Americans think that this Senate has sat too long for the good that we have done.

And as Chamberlain slunk away that historic day, the crowd shouted after him, "Go, go, go."

Then, you remember, Winston Churchill, who had been a voice in the wilderness warning for years about the threat of Hitler, became Prime Minister.

And in that famous speech to Parliament in May of 1940, he uttered those famous words, "I have nothing to offer but blood, tears, toil, and sweat."

Madam President, what does this Senate have to offer? What do we have to offer in this time of crisis? How about a little bipartisanship, perhaps? That is not too much to ask, is it, compared to blood, tears, toil, and sweat?

Because, as Churchill continued in that speech, "We have before us an ordeal of the most grievous kind." We certainly have that today, an ordeal of the most grievous kind.

Churchill went on:

We have before us many long months of struggle and of suffering. You ask what is our policy?

I will say: It is to wage war, by sea, land and air with all our might and with all the strength that God can give us; to wage war against a monstrous tyranny, never surpassed in the dark, lamentable catalogue of human crime. That is our policy.

You ask what is our aim? I can answer in one word—victory—victory at all costs, victory in spite of all terror, however long and hard the road may be; for without victory there is no survival. Without victory, there is no survival.

And then Churchill said this:

At this time I feel entitled to claim the aid of all, and I say "Come, then let us go forward together with our united strength."

Then, Clement Attlee, the leader of the opposing Labor Party, joined with Churchill as his Deputy Prime Minister and they worked together during the course of the war.

Why can't we have something like that around here now? Is that too much to ask when we are in a death struggle for the soul of mankind?

So, Madam President, I have made my choice. When it comes to choosing between an aged, arthritic civil service system filled with stumbling blocks and booby traps, or an agile agency that is nimble and responsive on the other, this American stands with his President.

I have made my choice. When it comes to choosing between real homeland security that protects somebody's life or homebound insecurity that protects somebody's job, this American stands with his President.

Deep down, I know that I am not the only one on my side of the aisle who feels this way. And I hope that I will not be the only one on my side of the aisle who votes with the President.

Seldom has there been—on any issue—a greater need for united, bipartisan support to make that "relentless march" to bring security to our Nation and justice to our enemies.

Thank you, Madam President.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Madam President, I have been in Congress for 24 years, and I have never heard a better speech. I have never heard a clearer statement of principle. I congratulate the Senator from Georgia.

Tomorrow, the Senator from Georgia and I will announce the completion of an effort we have had underway for several weeks. We will try to look at concerns about the President's bill that have been raised in the House, we will try to look at concerns that have been raised in the Senate, we will try to look at changes that were made in the House bill and the Senate bill, and even try to come up with a bill that addresses those concerns, but does it in such a way as to protect the President's ability to fight and to win this war on terrorism.

Also, Madam President, let me make it clear: When 9/11 happened and the President decided he wanted to create a new independent agency by taking parts of the Government that were not working together, that were not communicating effectively, and putting them into a coherent whole, I would have thought 100 Members of the Senate would have supported that effort.

I was wrong. If anybody had told me that in light of 9/11, the death of thousands of our people and the imminent danger we face every day that we would have an effort in the Senate to actually take power away from the President. This is power that President Carter had, power that President Reagan had, power that President Bush had, and power that President Bush has today, I wouldn't have believed it.

Who would believe that a bill that could not have been passed before 9/11, a bill that literally strips away the power of the President to designate a national emergency and in the process waive work rules that impede efficiency and jeopardize lives? Who would have believed, after thousands of our citizens were dead, after millions of our citizens are in danger, that the Senate would come forward with a bill that says: What is our response to 9/11? Our response is the President has too many national security powers.

That is exactly what the Lieberman bill does.

Incredibly, the President today has the power, in the name of national security, to set aside union work rules.

The majority leader said yesterday:

Show me one time in history when the circumstances threatening our country demanded we forgo the protections built into laws for Federal workers.

Well, let me give you, very quickly, some concrete examples of exactly why, after 9/11, we need to preserve the powers the President has today. Let me remind my colleagues, today, prior to 9/11, the President had used these powers, as President Clinton did, to set aside union contracts in the FBI, the CIA, the National Security Agency, the Air Marshals Office of the Federal Aviation Administration, the Office of Criminal Enforcement, and the Office of Enforcement and Intelligence at the Drug Enforcement Agency.

Workers in those offices today are working under the procedures the President has asked that he be allowed to continue to exercise.

What kinds of problems do you run into with these silly union work rules? Let me say to my colleagues, I don't see how anybody with a straight face can stand on the floor of the Senate and defend the civil service system as it exists today, when you are talking about threats to the lives of our children and our families. It is not as if we have not been warned. The Grace Commission warned us. The Volcker Commission stated:

The current system is slow. It is legally trampled and intellectually confused. It is impossible to explain to potential candidates. It is almost certainly not fulfilling the spirit of our mandate to hire the most meritorious candidates.

That is Paul Volcker, and that is in 1989.

Our colleague, Senator Rudman headed the U.S. Commission on National Security. We all know Warren Rudman. We all know he is no union basher. We all know he has good judgment and good sense. This is what he said:

Today's Civil Service system has become a drag on our national security. The morass of rules, regulation and bureaucracy prevent the government from hiring and retaining the workforce that is required to combat the threats of the future.

I could go on. For example, the Brookings Institution has shown study after study that the system is broken.

Now, after giving President Carter, President Reagan, President Bush,

President Clinton, and the current President Bush the power to set aside these union work rules for national security reasons, and after the events of 9/11, the majority brings forth a bill that says: Well, we gave this power to President Clinton and we gave the power to President Carter, but after 9/11, we are going to take away security powers of the President.

That is offensive and ludicrous on its face, and when the American people discover it, they are going to go absolutely crazy. When they discover that we currently have eight agencies operating under these rules today, and the Congress, in its response to 9/11, wants to say: Well, we are going to take away powers from this President that President Clinton needed and President Carter needed—I don't think so. I don't think people are going to buy it.

What kinds of impediments are we talking about? Well, let me touch a few. These are actual cases. I am not talking about theoretical cases. The majority leader says, show him examples of where these work rules interfere with national security. Let me quickly give you a handful of them.

We had an effort in Customs, in 1987, to change the makeup of our inspection center in the Customs office at Logan Airport. The idea was, change the makeup of the office in order to make it more efficient in fulfilling the functions of Customs. Guess what? Customs tried to change the configuration of the room. The public employee labor union, representing Customs officials, appealed to the Federal Labor Relations Authority, and the power of the Administration to change the configuration of the inspection room was rejected.

Do we really want some work rule negotiated prior to 9/11 to prevent us from finding somebody who is carrying a bomb on a plane with your momma? Have people gone completely crazy? What is going on here?

Let me touch on a couple of these. Union work rules prohibited an agency from working together to protect the border. Literally, as our former drug czar Barry McCaffrey pointed out, the union work rules prohibited one of the agencies from opening trunks. The drug smugglers were aware of it, had people at the border watching, and decided to move drugs based on those work rules.

What if that is poisonous gas or biological weapons or a nuclear weapon coming into New York Harbor? We are going to go to the National Labor Relations Authority to renegotiate a union contract when millions of lives are at stake? I don't think so. And the idea that our colleagues would believe such a thing is possible just shows you how out of touch some people are with their commitment to the status quo as compared to their commitment to the job at hand.

Very quickly, because I am running out of time, there was a prohibition of agencies for increasing the number of immigration inspectors. We had an effort to increase the number of inspections of immigration inspectors in 1990. And under union work rules, it was rejected because of a union contract.

Do people really think, in light of 9/11, we should allow a union contract to stand in our way and spend months and months and months before the National Labor Relations Authority trying to change that contract, rather than saying there is a clear and present danger to America and we want to change it today?

Now, the President has that power. But under the Lieberman bill, that power would be taken away. I could go on and give you dozens of real-life examples of how ridiculous these union work rules are. Look, if we were not talking about people's lives, we could all play this game of just saying how sacred these union work rules are that make our Federal Government the laughingstock of the country and the world. But when we are talking about lives and talking about the powers that four Presidents have had, the idea that we are going to take that power away from this President, at this time, is totally unacceptable.

To add insult to injury, the President has asked for flexibility. He has asked for the right to promote good people and put them in the right place, and not wait 5 months to hire somebody, and to fire incompetents. The President cannot promote the lady from the FBI who sent a memo to the home office saying: Hey, we have people with terrorist links who are learning to fly planes and not land them, and maybe we ought to do something about it.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 11:30 a.m. having arrived, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12:30 p.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 10 minutes each.

Mr. GRAMM. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes.

Mrs. BOXER. I object. I ask if the Senator can complete in 5 minutes.

Mr. GRAMM. Yes, I can do it in 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. GRAMM. Madam President, the President wanted the ability to do things such as promote that FBI agent because, had we been able to get through that massive, incoherent system in which we are working, we might have prevented the attacks.

I also think we might want to fire the people at INS who gave visas to the people who had flown a plane into the World Trade Center after their picture had been on every television in the world and on the front page of every newspaper.

We have, as a Senate, approved those flexibilities, those powers, for the Transportation Security Administration, the Internal Revenue Service, the FAA, and we did that prior to 9/11. But after 9/11, we are told that the President, under national security circumstances, with a declaration of a clear and present danger to our people, cannot have the kind of flexibility in homeland security that we gave to a previous President for the Internal Revenue Service. To make the Internal Revenue Service more responsible, we gave President Bill Clinton, personnel flexibility. But now, to protect the lives of our people in homeland security, are we not willing to give the same flexibility to President Bush?

When the American people finally discover what is going on here, they are going to be outraged, and they are going to discover it because, despite our best efforts of saying let's work together, let's do this on a bipartisan effort, it is clear now that there is going to be a battle. It is clear now that we are going to have to choose between the status quo, the old way of doing business, and the health, safety, and lives of our people.

The choice is as stark as a choice can be. The bill that is before us literally takes power away from the President that every President since Jimmy Carter has had to use national security waivers. It takes that power away from the President in the aftermath of 9/11. The American people will never understand that, and they will never accept it. They will never accept a compromise on it.

When the American people realize we were concerned enough about the Internal Revenue Service's operation that we gave President Clinton personnel flexibility to hire and fire and promote, because we thought it was important, but we are not willing to give President Bush the same flexibility to protect the lives of our people, I don't think they are going to take kindly to that.

The plain truth is that we have a bill before us that protects everything except national security. It protects every special interest group in the American Government. The plain truth is, the people who work for the Government want these changes. An OPM poll looking at accountability in the Federal Government. By very large margins, two-thirds of the people who are Federal workers believe that Federal performers are not adequately disciplined. Nearly half of all workers believe job performance has little or nothing to do with promotion and raises, and 99 percent of people who got bad evaluations last year in the Federal Government got pay raises. When we are talking about national security, when we are looking at the aftermath of 9/11, it is time for change. It is not time for the same old special interests.

So what we are asking, in essence, is very simply—and I will conclude on this—let this President keep the power that every President since Jimmy Carter has had, which is to use national security waivers. That hardly seems extreme given the attack on America and the deaths of thousands of our people. Give this President the same flexibility in national security and homeland security that we gave Bill Clinton with the Internal Revenue Service. If that sounds extreme, you are looking at things differently than I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the first half of the time is under the control of the majority leader or his designee, and the second half of the time is under the control of the Republican leader or his designee.

Mr. REID. Madam President, my friend from Texas got an extra 5 minutes. I ask that it be charged against the Republicans' time in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 2003—Continued

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now continue with the Department of the Interior appropriations bill.

The pending Craig amendment will be temporarily set aside.

The Senator from California is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 4573 TO AMENDMENT NO. 4472

Mrs. BOXER. Madam President, I send an amendment to the desk. It has been cleared on both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mrs. BOXER], for herself, Mr. INOUE, and Mr. CAMPBELL, proposes an amendment numbered 4573 to amendment No. 4472.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: To prohibit the use of funds to determine the validity of mining claims of, or to approve the plan of operations submitted by, the Glamis Imperial Corporation for the Imperial project in the State of California)

On page 64, between lines 15 and 16, insert the following:

SEC. 1. IMPERIAL PROJECT.

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, none of the funds provided by this Act or under any other Act may be used by the Secretary of the Interior to determine the validity of mining claims of, or to approve the plan of operations submitted by, the Glamis Imperial Corporation for the Imperial project, an open-pit gold mine located on public land administered by the Bureau of Land Management in Imperial County, California.

Mrs. BOXER. This amendment would prohibit the use of funds to determine the validity of mining claims of, or to approve the plan of operations submitted by, the Glamis Imperial Corporation for the Imperial project in California. It has been cleared by the leaders, and I thank them very much. I ask that the Senate adopt it at this time.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 4573) was agreed to.

Mr. BURNS. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mrs. BOXER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 4574 TO AMENDMENT NO. 4472

Mr. BURNS. Madam President, I send to the desk an amendment for Mr. BROWNBACK of Kansas and ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the pending amendment is set aside. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. BURNS], for Mr. BROWNBACK, proposes an amendment numbered 4574 to amendment No. 4472.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: To clarify the effect of certain provisions on the application of a Federal appellate decision and the use of certain Indian land)

On page 64, between lines 15 and 16, insert the following:

SEC. 1. EFFECT OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS ON DECISION AND INDIAN LAND.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Nothing in section 134 of the Department of the Interior and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 2002 (115 Stat. 443) affects the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit in Sac and Fox Nation v. Norton, 240 F.3d 1250 (2001).

(b) USE OF CERTAIN INDIAN LAND.—Nothing in this section permits the conduct of gaming under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act (25 U.S.C. 2701 et seq.) on land described in section 123 of the Department of the Interior and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 2001 (114 Stat. 944), or land that is contiguous to that land, regardless of whether the land or contiguous land has been taken into trust by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BURNS. Madam President, this amendment provides that nothing in section 134 of the fiscal year 2002 Interior bill shall impact ongoing litigation involving the Department of the Interior and the Sac and Fox Nation. This language has previously been passed by the Senate and addresses the inadvertent impact of language adopted in conference on the fiscal year 2002 bill. I recommend its adoption.

Mr. REID. There is no objection on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no further debate, without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment (No. 4574) was agreed to.

Mr. BURNS. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mrs. BOXER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Madam President, I ask that now we move to morning business.

Mr. BURNS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that on completion of morning business, the Craig amendment be the pending business when we reopen discussions on the appropriations bill.

Mr. REID. Reserving the right to object, would that be the order anyway?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the order.

Mr. BURNS. I did not know.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to a period for morning business as under the previous order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senate is in a period for morning business.

The Senate majority leader.

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I will use my leader time. I ask unanimous consent to extend the time, should that be required, to complete my presentation this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE STATE OF ECONOMIC SECURITY

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, we had a very good discussion this morning with the President talking about national security in several contexts—of course, the war on terror and the important challenges this country faces in continuing to make this country and the world a safer place in which to live. The arrests over the weekend and the cooperation we got from Pakistan ought to be particularly noted, and we ought to thank the Government of Pakistan for their cooperation. We talked about that this morning.

We talked about Iraq and the threat it poses to us. We talked about the need for cooperation when dealing with the threats posed by Iraq, not only within the Congress and the country, but in the international community. So we had a very good discussion about national security, and I believe it ought to be uppermost in the minds of all people, and certainly the Congress as we continue to complete our responsibilities in the second session of the 107th Congress.

Let me also say, just as we properly recognize the threat that exists in more traditional national security areas, we, as a country and particularly as a government, would be remiss in our responsibilities were we not to address economic security, were we not to recognize the peril this country is in economically. So, in addition to acknowledging the importance of our defense activities, I also wanted to come to the Chamber this morning to express my concern for the lack of attention paid to the state of economic security, to express the concern that many of us have with regard to what has been a very unfortunate, some would even say tragic, economic trend in this country over the course of the last 18 months.

I have a number of charts that reflect more graphically some of these concerns, and I want, if I may, to walk through some of them at this time.

If we look at the record of this administration over the past 18 months, perhaps it is best summarized in the very first chart: Record job losses; weak economic growth; declining business investment; falling stock market; shrinking retirement accounts; eroding consumer confidence; rising health care costs; escalating foreclosures; vanishing surpluses and higher resulting interest costs; raiding the Social Security trust fund; record executive pay; and stagnating minimum wage.

If you were going to use the shortest list with the greatest concern, this chart is it.

Let me go through many of these individual concerns a little more thoroughly. Over the last 2 years—actually the last 18 months—we have lost 2 million jobs—private sector jobs in this country.

If there is any one criteria that would, more than any other, illustrate the health of the economy, it would be job growth. If the economy is growing, jobs are going to be there. If it is contracting, if the economy is weak or contracting, the jobs will not be there. We have lost 2 million jobs in 18 months.

People might say: Well, that just happens; other administrations have lost jobs.

If you wanted to go back and look at what other administrations have actually done, you would probably have to go all the way back to the 1930s to see the last time in our Nation's history when we last witnessed a loss in private sector jobs over the course of the life of an administration. Private sector jobs during this administration have declined by 1.2 percent on an average annual basis.

Over the last 50 years, in every administration since Dwight Eisenhower, we have seen private sector job growth. It was not much in the Eisenhower administration. It was even less under the first Bush administration. And we have seen remarkable job growth on three other occasions—the Johnson administration in the 1960s, the Carter administration in the 1970s, and the Clinton administration in the 1990s.

What have we seen in the first few years of the current administration? We have actually seen a decline in the number of private sector jobs for the first time in 50 years.

One can look at it another way. It is not only how many jobs are lost. It is also important to see how many people have been trying to find jobs for long periods of time and have been unable to do so, those who have been out of work for more than 6 months, the so-called long-term unemployed. Some who lose their job are able to quickly find another one. For those who are unable to do so, such as those who fall into the category of long-term unemployed, we continue to come to this Chamber and press for the passage of unemployment compensation extensions.

In January of 2001, the number of long-term unemployed was 648,000. In August of this year, that number had more than doubled to 1,474,000 people. That is also one of the most tragic figures. There is a human story behind every one of those numbers. Not only is that individual unemployed, but most likely that person and perhaps their family are without income. Most likely it is a family trying to survive on what meager unemployment compensation they have, looking for odd jobs, doing whatever they can to make ends meet. And today you have more than 1.4 million people who have suffered as a result of this administration's economic policies for the last 18 months.

The larger picture beyond employment that is frequently used to gauge the performance of the economy is the change in our real gross domestic product. That is probably the most traditional economic indicator for assessing the strength of the economy. In the first 18 months of this administration, the economy has grown by 1 percent. The rate of growth was twice that figure under the first Bush administration. But those are the two lowest economic performances, the most meager economic performances we have seen in the last 50 years. President Eisenhower had economic growth of 2.4 percent; Kennedy, 5.4 percent; Johnson, 4.9 percent; the Clinton administration, 3.6 percent. We have seen growth, fortunately, in every administration.

But in all those administrations with all the economic ups and downs we have seen, it is clear this administration has the worst performance in terms of real economic growth that we have seen in the last 50 years. That anemic economic performance has had huge consequences in national terms as well as in personal terms for American workers, American businesses, American investors, and American pension holders.

This chart shows what has happened to the value of investments at the New York Stock Exchange and the NASDAQ stock market under this administration. When this administration took office in January, 2001, the overall market value, the market capitalization in those two markets alone, was $16.4 trillion. That was an all-time high. We had never seen anything close to that level. Under the Clinton administration, the markets had been booming. We saw growth in an unprecedented way.

We expected, everyone expected, that growth to continue. But that is not what happened. What happened, instead, was over the last 18 months that $16.4 trillion pie has now shrunk to $11.9 trillion. We have lost $4.5 trillion in market capitalization just in 18 months.

I defy anyone to find a record more abysmal when it comes to overall market valuation that is even comparable to the enormous loss we have seen in just the past 18 months.

It goes beyond that. If you look at an individual worker's retirement savings—that is what we are talking about when we talk about the loss of market capitalization—the impact is profound. If that worker had a $100,000 retirement fund invested in the market in 2001 and kept it there during the 18 months this administration has been in office, that loss in market capitalization would mean the worker saw the value of his retirement savings decline by more than $31,000. In other words, the worker in just 18 months has lost nearly a third of the nest egg he was counting on for the balance of his retirement, all of their retiring years. One-third of his retirement savings meant for a life time, gone in 18 months.

Not surprisingly, this shrinkage in market capitalization has had a profound effect on pensioners. It is why, when I was home over both the Fourth of July and August recesses, I was amazed to hear how frequently people came up and said, Tom, you know, I just saw my latest statement regarding my retirement. I think there was a mistake. I cannot believe what has happened. The value of my pension has declined precipitously. This is a shock to us all. You have to do something.

These large economic numbers have large financial consequences for people in South Dakota and all over this country who believed if they regularly contributed to their retirement investment accounts, they would have retirement security. That security is not there today, a mere 18 months after this administration took office.

Again, how does that compare? Some will say: Ups and downs in the market are just a way of life; those are cycles; accept the cycles; that is the way it works. However, if you look at the average annual change in the value of the market, you have to go back a long time to find a period where the performance is as bad as what we are witnessing now.

During the Nixon administration, we lost approximately 5 percent in the S&P 500 account. You have to go all the way back to Herbert Hoover as compared to a performance in the Standard & Poors 500 equal to what we are experiencing right now. We saw a 30 percent decline under Herbert Hoover as compared to the 20 percent in the first 18 months of this administration. And this administration's watch is still ticking; that one is over.

But look at all the other years, all the other administrations, all the other record performances, all the other economic strategies. It grew 15 percent in the Clinton administration; it grew 14 percent in the Ford administration; it even grew in the Coolidge administration. But if I had to pick one chart that compares economic performance, I cannot think of a more graphic illustration of how terrible this economy truly is and how poorly our markets are performing and how little confidence there is in the economic strategy of this administration.

Again, I come back to what does this all really mean to the working family, to that rancher or farmer or small businessman, or to that hard-hat worker or blue-collar worker who comes to me in South Dakota? We have seen that meager economic growth and a collapsing stock market means fewer jobs, more unemployment, and less retirement security. But what has happened to the costs of their basic goods and services?

Workers' payments for health insurance provides an excellent example of how strapped these people are. In just the past 18 months since this administration took office, the cost of an average family's health insurance coverage, a basic need for all families, has gone up 16 percent. Single coverage has gone up 27 percent. That is the kind of record we are talking about.

We can move this to other aspects of health care. We see a similar trend when we look at the rising cost of prescription drugs. While the Consumer Price Index has gone up 1.6 percent since this administration took office, the cost of prescription drugs has grown by 5.7 percent, almost four times greater than the overall inflation rate.

We also have seen something else we never thought we would see a dramatic increase in the number of foreclosures. A number of our colleagues have followed this even more closely than I have and have noted we are not just talking here about minimum wage workers when we talk about foreclosures. We are not just talking about people at the lowest end of the economic scale. What has happened is a phenomena we have not seen in a long time in this country. Middle-class workers, people with good incomes when working, are watching their mortgages foreclose. The thousands of layoffs have caused an increasing number of them to suffer in another way, the personal pain of losing their home. At the end of last year, 1.15 percent of mortgage loans were in foreclosure. By the second quarter of this year, that number had grown to 1.63 percent, an increase that affects not only lower income workers but workers across the economic scale.

Another tragic aspect of this administration's economic policies can be seen when we look at its impact on our fiscal circumstances. We have talked about market capitalization. We have talked about the loss of jobs. We have talked about the economic pain our working families are feeling as they see their own pension security come down. As they see unemployment rolls go up, as they see the long-term unemployed numbers continue to climb, as they see all of that on one side and higher costs for health care and prescription drugs on the other, they ask why.

How in the world could all of this happen in such a short period of time? There are a lot of answers to that question. But if I could point to one in particular, it would be this. If there is one reason we have seen the dramatic turn in such a short period of time, the historic turn in the economy, it is the unprecedented reversal in the federal government's fiscal picture. When President Bush took office, the Congressional Budget Office projected a $5.6 trillion surplus. As a result of what the President has signed into law or is currently proposing, the surplus projection becomes a $400 billion deficit. What does that do to economic confidence? What does that do to market capitalization? What does that do to long-term projections? To long-term interest rates? What does that do to the overall psychology in the economy, to see this precipitous a decline?

I was talking to a journalist the other day, about what history will say about the last 2 years. I hope to have something to say about the way it is written. I am excited about a project I am working on in that regard. But he said, as we consider all of the historic moments of the last 2 years, the one that he believes has the greatest consequence for our country is the President's tax cut proposal. You know, a lot of people would argue he was right. The tragic set of financial and economic circumstances we are witnessing today, is directly connected to the tragic decline in our fiscal circumstance.

This can be illustrated another way. At the beginning of last year, CBO projected the publicly held debt would be $36 billion by the year 2008. In fact, members actually came to the Senate floor to argue we were paying down the debt too quickly, and we would pay a price for having done so. Let me say that problem is no longer a concern. There is no way we are going to have to worry about paying off anything too quickly because in the space of 18 months that projection has grown from $36 billion to the new projection issued last month of $3.8 trillion. That is the record.

We have gone from a projected $5.6 trillion surplus to a $400 billion deficit and from $36 billion in projected debt by 2008 to $3.8 trillion. What a tragic, deplorable, abysmal set of circumstances for us to find ourselves in as we close out this session of Congress.

The Bush economic record could be also described in terms of what it costs us. You can talk about deficits. You can talk about all the economic impact that deficit may have, the accumulated debt. But practically speaking, what it really means is that we have to pay hundreds of billion in additional interest costs. It is thievery. It is robbery. Increased interest payments steal from the very heart and soul of the commitments we have to make, as a country, to national defense, to education, to housing, to infrastructure, or to additional tax cuts. In short, these costs take away resources from all of national security, economic, and environmental priorities facing our nation today. They are all robbed by the fact that we have to pay $1.9 trillion in interest costs over the next 10 years. When this administration took office, we thought we were only going to have to pay $620 billion. Since this administration took office, we have gone from $620 billion in interest costs to $1.9 trillion. And every dollar was either going to be dedicated to Social Security or dealing with the investments we as a country must make, or in tax cuts, the need for which both sides have talked about.

When you talk about what the historic fiscal reversal means in real terms, it is higher interest costs, it is lack of an opportunity to invest in national defense, education, and health.

But here is the real story. We all promised—I will bet there is not a Senator in this Chamber who did not say: We are going to put Social Security first; who did not rise to the standards set by the past administration in saying to the country: Whatever else we do, we are going to protect Social Security.

In fact, President Bush had a Web page. I haven't looked recently to see if it is still there. But the President made a solemn pledge on that Web page: I will never take a dollar of your Social Security trust funds.

Here we are. We had a commitment in January of 2001 that we were never going to touch those Social Security dollars. We find ourselves now, in August of 2002, having already committed $2 trillion of the Social Security trust fund—$2 trillion, and we are not finished yet. That number is going to continue to grow. If current economic trends continue and we enact the President's tax and spending proposals, there is no doubt we will be spending even more of the Social Security trust fund. What is the President's solution? Mr. President, President Bush's solution appears to be pretty clear. There is not any other solution I have heard this administration talk about. They have one all-purpose, economic antidote to everything, and that is tax cuts—tax cuts largely dedicated to those at the very top. The only thing I have seen the Bush administration fail to suggest a tax cut for, so far, is the drought. Except for the drought, I can't think of another serious problem this country faces where the administration has offered up a tax cut as the solution.

Let's look a little bit at the tax cut proposed by this administration. The Bush economic record already is very clear. This is already on the books. This is what is going to happen. The tax cuts that have been enacted so far favor the very wealthiest of Americans. If you are in the lowest 20th percentile, with an average income of $9,300 a year, your average annual tax cut was $66. We have a lot of South Dakotans in that category.

If you are in the second 20 percent, with an average income of $20,000—and I would say that is the majority of South Dakotans, the overwhelming majority—you get $375 a year.

If you are in the upper brackets in my State, making somewhere around $40,000, your tax cut was $600 a year.

If you make $56,000—now we are getting into pretty rare air here in my state—you get a tax cut of about $1,000. If you make about $100,000 a year, you get a tax cut of $2,000. If you make $210,000—there are not many of those in South Dakota—you get a tax cut of $3,345.

If you make an average of $1.1 million a year and you are in that top 1 percent, you get a tax cut of $53,000, an amount that is actually twice the average income of the people in the State of the Presiding Officer, South Dakota.

These are the beneficiaries. A lot of these people make a lot more than $1 million a year. They make $700 million, $148 million, $127 million, down to $23 million a year. Look at all those names and all that money, and you know where their friends are. You know who their defenders are.

(Mr. JOHNSON assumed the Chair.)

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield for a question on that chart momentarily?

Mr. DASCHLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. If I understand this chart, if you are in the top 1 percent of the wealthiest Americans, under the President's proposal you would receive a tax cut that would equal the income—not the tax cut—of approximately six earners in the lowest 20 percent of the income scale. In other words, the people in that income scale have an average income of about $9,000 a year, as I understand the chart. They would get a tax cut of $66 a year. They get $9,000 in total income, while the upper 1 percent will get a tax cut just shy of $54,000. The tax cut alone is equal to the earnings of six people in the bottom 20 percent of the income scale.

Is that correct?

Mr. DASCHLE. The chairman of the Banking Committee has put his finger on exactly what it is we are trying to focus on here—the disparity and the extraordinary maldistribution this tax cut represents. There is an unbelievable disconnect here between those at the lowest end who have already seen cuts in education and health care, declines in their retirement accounts, and who are probably in many cases working three or four minimum wage jobs, attempting to make a living. They get a $66 tax cut. Those making an average of $1.1 million a year get a tax cut of more than $53,000. In fact, some in this category make more than $700 million a year and who knows the size of the tax cut these people would get?

The sad thing is—and the Senator from Maryland makes such a good point—that those people who have virtually no tax cut available to them are the very ones who have seen their purchasing power decline.

Since 1997, we have seen the real earnings of full-time minimum wage workers, over half of whom are women and heads of households, decline from $11,560 to $10,300. But can we get a minimum wage vote on this floor? Can we get the kind of support on a bipartisan basis required to deal with this situation? No. We can get the support for that $53,000 tax cut for the top 1 percent. But I can't find the Republican support nor the administration support and leadership required to deal with this extraordinary and sad consequence of the government's inaction on the minimum wage.

Mr. CORZINE. Mr. President, will the leader yield for a question?

Mr. DASCHLE. I would be happy to yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CORZINE. Did I hear the leader suggest that we are talking about taking $2 trillion out of the Social Security trust fund to fund the other things that are going on with regard to economic policy? If I am not mistaken, I think I saw a chart that projected $2 trillion and how we would utilize the Social Security trust fund. I think those are payroll taxes from working Americans from all walks of life.

Then, if I am not mistaken, as I looked at your chart where the tax cuts are actually going, it would appear to me that we are using the Social Security trust fund to fund tax cuts for those at the very high end of the marginal tax brackets.

Is my analysis from looking at your charts correct? Does the leader have a comment on that?

Mr. DASCHLE. The distinguished Senator from New Jersey makes a very good point. Probably no one can make that point with greater credibility than can he.

Let me just simply compare this chart. You have seen an increase in the draw down of the Social Security trust fund. We have actually spent $2 trillion of Social Security. We put those resources into this tax cut, providing $53,000 per year to the top 1 percent of income earners in this country. You have seen an income transfer from those paying payroll taxes—largely at the lower end of the income scale—to those at the upper end of the income scale. This represents an income transfer in the opposite direction from poor working people to those at the very top.

Mr. CORZINE. If the leader will bear with me a second, if we look at the table he has with regard to the second level, it looks as though some of the individuals who will benefit the most from this tax cut—it is almost inconceivable that we are using payroll taxes for men and women at WorldCom and Enron. It is just hard to believe.

Mr. DASCHLE. I know the Senator from New Jersey remembers this. But I recall the House passed their economic stimulus package, and part of that package included a $254 million retroactive tax cut for Enron. The administration saw no problem with that. Our Republican friends were anxious to vote for it. In fact, when we stopped it, we were called obstructionists. But that was the kind of obstructionism that stopped Enron from getting $254 million from their taxes.

To summarize, what ought to be going up is coming down and what ought to be going down is coming up. What ought to go down is the raid on the Social Security trust fund. It is going up. What ought to go down are interest costs, but they are going up. What ought to go down is the national debt, but it is going up. What ought to go down are foreclosures, health care costs, and job losses, but they are going up. What ought to go up—economic growth—is going down. What ought to go up is business investment, the market, retirement accounts, consumer confidence, and the minimum wage. They ought to go up. But in these last 18 months, every single one of these factors has gone down.

This will be the subject of a lot more discussion, debate, and hopefully illumination over the course of the next several weeks and months. But we have to change these arrows. We have to ensure that economic growth goes up. We have to ensure that the stock market, retirement accounts, pension funds, consumer confidence, and the minimum wage go up. We have to do what we did in the 1990s—have an economic performance that gives people the sense that they can live in dignity and in confidence, knowing their retirement accounts and Social Security checks are going to be there.

We have to end the job loss, deal with health care costs, and make sure we reduce the raid on the Social Security trust fund.

I hope Republicans and Democrats can do for economic security what we are attempting now to for our national security—recognizing that this won't change unless we do it together, and recognizing that while this national security issue dealing with Iraq may be accomplished with one resolution, it is going to take a lot more than one resolution to turn our economy around. It is going to take the same kind of discipline we demonstrated in the 1990s. It is going to take the same kind of commitment on a bipartisan basis for these issues to be addressed, and a lot more consequential.

As busy as we are and as important as the effort on Iraq is, I hope this administration will dedicate some of its time this week to economic security as well, to these declining numbers, to this atrocious record, to a recognition that it takes leadership not only with regard to international and foreign policy but leadership here at home and economic policy as well. We haven't seen it to date, and the time has come for leadership on this as well.

I yield the floor.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time the majority used in excess of our half hour be extended to the minority for morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Maryland.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT INSURANCE

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for his excellent presentation with respect to the state of our economy. He has described in very straightforward terms the serious economic problems we confront: weak economic growth, rising job losses, declining business investment, a falling stock market, eroding consumer confidence, and a deteriorating Federal Government fiscal position.

Just this morning, the Wall Street Journal reported:

What looked like a brief dip in economic activity a month ago looks increasingly like a protected slowdown. . . . The Federal Reserve said Tuesday that industrial production fell 0.3 percent in August from July, the first decline since December, when the recession was ending.

The majority leader made a compelling case, in my view, for focusing the attention of the Congress and the President on the urgent economic challenges we confront at home, as well as the significant security and foreign policy challenges we confront abroad.

I wish to take a few moments to focus briefly on a very pressing economic challenge that is before us right now and which ought to be addressed before the end of the year: the problem of the long-term unemployed and the need to extend unemployment insurance benefits. I urge the administration to submit to the Congress a proposal for the extension of unemployment insurance benefits.

On September 9, the New York Times ran a front page story entitled, "Long-Term Jobless Rose by 50 Percent Last Year." The article stated—and I now quote from it—

. . . the number of people who have been jobless for months has climbed to a level more typical of a deep downturn. Almost three million people nationwide have been out of work for at least 15 weeks, up more than 50 percent from a year ago. Half of them have not worked for at least 6 months. Another million Americans appear to have dropped out of the labor force in each of the past two years, no longer looking for work or counted as unemployed. . . . Many people who have not worked in months have begun spending retirement savings that were already diminished by the stock market's fall. Others are considering low-wage jobs at a fraction of their old pay. In either case, their stretches of unemployment could define their financial futures for years.

It goes on to say:

Many unemployed people . . . see little sign that companies will soon begin hiring in large numbers. And some are growing increasingly nervous because unemployment benefits that were extended . . . will expire soon.

I want to make a very simple but important point in light of this rise in the long-term unemployed and the challenge that it presents. I strongly urge the administration to address it and to send the proposal to the Congress.

We extended the unemployment compensation program earlier this year to provide an additional 13 weeks beyond the basic 26 weeks. But this program is scheduled to end on December 31 of this year, which means that someone who is then in the 27th week of their benefits at the end of 2002 could receive no further unemployment benefits. This program is scheduled to end at the very time when the number of long-term unemployed is not coming down, but is increasing.

The projections on the unemployment front are not encouraging. The CBO predicts the unemployment rate will remain near 6 percent until the second half of next year. When we enacted the extension, it was at 5.7 percent. Unemployment is projected to stay high well into next year, while the extension is scheduled to expire on December 31 of this year.

Now, in previous recessions—and it is important to note this—we extended the increase in the time period to collect unemployment benefits. Back in the recession of 1990–1991, unemployment benefits were extended five separate times. In fact, not only were they initially extended by 13 to 20 weeks but then the period was lengthened again to between 52 and 59 weeks. I am very frank to tell you I think we have to confront this situation.

States are reporting larger increases in the exhaustion of unemployment benefits during this recession than during the last recession. So for those people who have been thrown out of work—and I am not going to go through the litany of it; much of it has hit the dot-com industry—they either have or are close to having exhausted their unemployment benefit payments. They are going to be in even deeper trouble once they cross that threshold and exhaust their unemployment benefit payments.

I am not seeking anything that is out of the ordinary in terms of past experience, but I think these benefits must be extended.

Let me make one final point. The temporary provision of additional Federal benefits to the unemployed, in the wake of economic downturns, has long served a dual purpose. Beyond providing needed income support to those whose spells of unemployment are lengthened by recessionary conditions, it is also very well designed to give the economy a boost.

Unemployment benefits are quickly injected into the economy. Benefits can be paid immediately through the existing unemployment insurance system. They are targeted to areas where the downturn has hit the hardest. They go to areas with large concentrations of newly unemployed who qualify for benefits. They stimulate demand where it has deteriorated the most. They are very effective in boosting the economy. And, of course, they come to the rescue of people who have found themselves out of work and are under extreme stress in order to meet the financial demands of supporting themselves and often their family as well.

So we need to extend unemployment benefits. We need to fill in the weaknesses in the system. We need to give the people who have lost their jobs, and are now confronting a very severe situation, some support in these trying circumstances.

We have extended unemployment benefits before repeatedly. It has worked. It has been seen to work. We need to do so again. I very strongly urge the administration to face this challenge and to send to the Congress—promptly and immediately—a proposal with respect to unemployment insurance benefits that would help to assure that the millions of people across the country, who already have or may in the future exhaust their unemployment benefits, will not find themselves without any income support at the same time that they are confronting an economy in which job restoration is not taking place.

If job restoration were taking place, and the economy was on the upswing, and one could reasonably say to people, well, opportunities are returning and, therefore, you can find work. But that is not what is happening. You have people facing an economy which is softening, as the Wall Street Journal reported just this morning, as they said, "What looked like a brief dip in economic activity a month ago looks increasingly like a protracted slowdown. . . ."

We must at a minimum provide this assistance.

I yield the floor.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. I want to make sure the record is clear. I asked earlier, whatever time Senator DASCHLE used be given to the Republican side in morning business, so that their morning business time would be extended by whatever time we went over morning business, which had been a half hour, plus whatever extra time he used.

How much time would that be, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would require 5 minutes.

Mr. REID. OK. And then whatever time Senator SARBANES used, that would also be given to them to speak in morning business. Is it clear the extra time used by Senator DASCHLE and the time used by Senator SARBANES would be given to the Republicans so they could speak in morning business, and that would delay our going to the homeland security bill for whatever additional time that is? I ask unanimous consent that be the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

LACK OF PROGRESS IN THE SENATE

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I listened intently as the majority leader spoke. I remind my colleagues, we are debating homeland security and that we are preparing for a debate and a vote on Iraq.

I don't think it ever does any harm, however, to talk about the fact that the country has additional challenges. I guess I would express two sources of disappointment with the speech the majority leader gave. The first source of disappointment would have to do with the absence of a program to deal with a single one of these problems.

Anybody who goes back and listens to that long litany of woe would say: What did the majority leader say we are supposed to do about it? One would search in vain, except for the hint of a program which I would have to say is sort of modeled after the Peronist economic program in Argentina today, which is to increase taxes and to spend more money.

In fact, I remind my colleagues, if we are as concerned as we say about the economy and about the security of our people, the logical place to start doing something about it is in the Senate. The plain truth is, if there has been one place where there has been inaction on issues relevant to the economy and relevant to the American people, it is the Senate.

In fact, the President proposed a budget in January. The House adopted a budget. The Senate not only has not adopted a budget, but we have made it eminently clear that we have no intention of adopting a budget.

I would have to say that if the majority is concerned about all these problems and the majority leader has the ability to bring a budget to the floor of the Senate tomorrow, a logical place to show that concern would be to do something about it by adopting a budget.

The plain truth is, we have adopted no budget, and we have continued to spend as if we still had the surplus that existed prior to the downturn and prior to the war.

In terms of prescription drugs for seniors under Medicare, the President has proposed a program. The House has adopted a program. But in the Senate, there is no program. The Finance Committee was never allowed to meet on the subject to put forward a bill. A hodgepodge of ideas came to the floor of the Senate. No consensus was built. It became a partisan issue. There was no action.

One thing that we could clearly do to bring stability to the economy and to promote job creation and economic growth would be to make the tax cuts permanent. What is more destabilizing to investment and economic growth than the fact that 9 years from today we will have the largest tax increase in American history? And it will occur automatically if we don't act.

In terms of homeland security, the President proposed a bill. The House acted. In the Senate, we have had inaction. We have had endless debate. We have talked about working together. We have talked about bipartisanship, but there is no bipartisanship on this issue. In fact, the Democrats have come forward with a bill that takes power away from the Presidency and the national security powers that President Carter had, President Reagan had, President Bush had, President Clinton had. But now, in the wake of thousands of our people being killed in a terrorist attack, suddenly our Democrat brethren say the President has too much national security power and they want to take some of it away from him. The American people are going to go absolutely crazy when they realize that this is the case.

In terms of welfare reform, the 1996 reforms were the greatest success in public policy in the postwar period. Now, the President has proposed a welfare reform bill. The House has adopted a welfare reform bill. But there is no action on welfare reform in the Senate.

Finally, the President proposed appropriations. Not one appropriations bill in its final form has passed the Congress, and only three have passed the Senate.

I would have to say there is a missing ingredient in the Majority Leader's speech when he talks about all the problems we face economically. When you look at the record of the Senate, let's begin at home. Let's begin to solve the problem where we live. That problem is in the Senate.

I will address two other issues because I know our Republican Leader wishes to speak. I would have to take exception, as I said last Tuesday that I would, on the issue about deficits. I do not understand how our Democrat colleagues can continue to stand up and moan and groan and cry about deficits as if they come from heaven, as if somehow God just said: We are going to have deficits. Deficits don't come from heaven; they are created right here on the floor of the Senate.

I would have to say that when we are talking about a commitment not to raid Social Security, when we are talking about concern about the deficit, I remind my colleagues, last Tuesday I stood right at that desk and raised a point of order that we were taking $6 billion right out of the Social Security Trust Fund. The Majority Leader led the fight to take it out.

Today, he is alarmed about the deficit. Today, he is upset about the deficit. Today, he is bemoaning the deficit. But Tuesday he helped create the deficit.

You can't have it both ways. You can't keep spending as if there is no tomorrow and then complain about the deficit.

Let me remind my colleagues, lest they think that suddenly the Government has become so tightfisted we are hurting our people: Over the last 5 years, inflation has been 1.8 percent on a year on average. Average family income has risen by 4.5 percent. And yet the discretionary spending of the Federal Government, driven largely by actions in the Senate—I am not talking about Medicare and Social Security and mandatory programs; I am talking about discretionary spending, something every family understands—at the time when family income was growing by 4.5 percent, discretionary spending, not counting the September 11 emergency funding, was growing by almost 7 percent.

When you look at what that means by program, this is the inflation rate, this red line, and this, by parts of the Government, is how fast the Government has grown as compared to inflation: six times as fast for Labor-HHS; five times as fast for Interior, five times as fast for Treasury. It goes on and on.

Yet the Majority Leader comes to the floor of the Senate today and says: We have a crisis. We need, in essence, to raise taxes—taxes are too low—so we can fund more spending.

Anybody who looks at the facts is going to conclude that not only have higher taxes and higher spending never helped any economy anywhere, but that we already have the higher spending and that we are creating these deficits as we go every day in the Senate.

Finally, I have to respond to this constant effort to try to pit people against each other based on their income. Envy destroyed ancient Athens; it destroyed ancient Rome. It is a dangerous thing for Americans to use, and it is outrageous, unfair, and unjustified.

Look at the people who make up the Senate and look at the families they come from and give me an argument that somehow there is some kind of elitism in America. It won't hold water. And we hear all this talk that these rich people are getting all these tax cuts—the top 1 percent. Senator DASCHLE reminds us they get the $50,000 tax cut. He didn't bother to point out that they are paying $400,000 in taxes. And as far as the low-income people who are not getting tax cuts are concerned, he didn't point out that they are not paying any taxes. Income tax cuts are for taxpayers. We have already been funding programs for non-taxpayers.

We had not had a real tax cut of any significance since 1981. And the reality is that our tax cut made the Tax Code more progressive and not less progressive. Under our tax cut, the top 1 percent of income earners will pay more taxes as a percentage than they pay now.

So I think what we are seeing here is that some of our colleagues are obviously embarrassed about the fact that we are not getting the job done in the Senate, and that the American people want a homeland security bill passed. I don't think changing the subject helps our effort.

In the end, if we are really concerned about those things—and we should be—we ought to go back and adopt a budget. We need to address these concerns the American public has. But it is never going to be enough to say that there is unhappiness in the country. Ultimately, you have to say what your program is to deal with it. The only program I heard today is we need more spending.

When Alan Greenspan was asked before the House Banking Committee what one thing we could do that would help the economy the most, he said: "Stop spending." Yet, last Thursday, we added $6 billion to the deficit, led by the very people who, today—last Thursday, they were for deficits; today, they are against deficits. But you cannot be for something on Tuesday and against it last Thursday and have any credibility in that debate.

So, in the end, we have work to do here. In my opinion, we need to pass a homeland security bill. That is lives today. We have to deal with the Iraq situation. And nothing would make me happier than to do something to help the economy. But that something is not spending and it is not tax increases. In fact, it would be exactly the opposite.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, how much time do we have in the designated time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 30 minutes remaining.

LITANY OF COMPLAINTS

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may consume. I will not take that much time, I am certain.

I feel a need to respond to Senator DASCHLE's comments a few minutes ago.

Before he leaves the Chamber, I want to say how much I appreciate, and the Senate appreciates, the Senator from Texas. He is going to be leaving this year. Maybe that is one of the reasons he is even more articulate than usual. He is saying what he really feels and thinks and is holding nothing back.

As I have said before—and I mean it sincerely—I don't know what we will do without him. We are going to have to create another one, although I am not sure it is possible. On behalf of the taxpayers of this country, and even those who might disagree with him sometimes, I say to the Senator that I appreciate him very much. He has certainly become a legend in this institution. We thank him for all he has done and all we know he is going to do. We hope he is very successful and pays his fair share of the taxes, which we hope to cut as the years go by.

Let me come back to what was said earlier. I think it was summed up in a headline this morning about the fact that Senator DASCHLE was going to make this speech. It says: "Daschle to Attack Bush Fiscal Policies." Unfortunately, that is all it was. It was a litany of complaints, citing certain statistics or certain areas where there might be a concern.

My first reaction is, even if you accept all of that as being a problem—and a lot of it is—what is your plan? What do you plan to do about it? What is the legislative agenda? What do you recommend we pass in the 3 weeks or so we have left here?

The President has had an agenda. The President sent a budget here, but it was all foreordained that we would come to this point this year when we got no budget resolution on the floor and voted on. I asked, why did we not have a budget resolution? We had one for 27, 28 years in a row. Now, all of a sudden, we will not have one. I was told, it is too hard when the Senate is this closely divided. In 2001, when the Senate was divided 50/50, we wound up passing a budget resolution by a wide margin, including, I think, a dozen Democrats who voted with most, if not all, Republicans.

So while every Senator has a right to point out concerns about the economy and the country, I think they ought to be in a position of saying, OK, what are you going to do about it? What is your plan or budget? At the time we had no budget agreement, I made note of the fact that we were going to have some sort of meltdown at the end of the fiscal year; we were not going to have endorsement mechanisms; it was going to be hard to get appropriations bills done because there was no common number agreed to on the total amount. That is what happened.

The other thing that really bothers me is, not only is there no real plan from the Senate, in instance after instance the House passed good legislation and the Senate has not taken it up—over 50 bills. I am not talking about bills to create a "watermelon recognition day"; I am talking about serious legislation, such as welfare reform. Surely we should have taken the next step to help people get off welfare, get training and education, and get what they need to get into a real job and pay taxes. That is the way you help the people and the economy. But welfare reform, the Senate is not going to act on that. We are still now working on homeland security.

Part of what we need to do for our economy in America is to reassure people that we are going to be safe and we are going to have the protections they need at home. They need to know that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness and the opportunity to make a decent living are going to be protected.

We are into the third week. Senator DASCHLE filed cloture to cut off a filibuster. Who is filibustering? It is not this side. There have been not more than three substantive amendments that have been given an opportunity to even be considered. Yet homeland security is languishing here in the Senate.

Hopefully, we will get it done this week, or next week, or sometime, so we can get it before we go out.

We have not made the tax cut permanent. We should do that. The ridiculousness of the uncertainty of not knowing whether the tax cuts are going to be applicable in the years to come—when I go around the country, people say: Explain this to me. How can you do such a thing, have a tax cut and not know for sure whether it is going to be in place down the road? We have not done that.

Prescription drugs: We could have had an agreement if we had gotten a prescription drug measure together and debated it and voted on it in the Finance Committee. We could have reported out a bipartisan bill that would have come to the floor and would have passed. We could have a bill probably out of conference now that would help low-income elderly people who do need this help in the future.

So in instance after instance, as Senator GRAMM pointed out, the Senate has not produced any results. There has been no plan. We have done three appropriations bills. We are on the fourth one. Not one bill will go to the President by the end of the fiscal year. I know it is tough because, as majority leader, year after year I had to wrestle with the appropriations bills. We got them done; usually, one by one we got them through the process. In 1996, we actually got them all done, and I think we got them done very close to the end of the fiscal year. It was harder and harder after that.

But how can you complain about what is happening in the economy when you have such uncertainty in the Government—what is going to be available for transportation, education, health and housing? That is all out there with no result.

The only proposal I have heard from some Democrats as to what we should do to be helpful within the economy is to spend more—always add more money, no matter what the issue is. Whenever a proposal is made by the President or by Republicans, Democrats say: We will double you or triple you. They think that is the way you create jobs—more Government spending. The Government is what kills jobs in many instances because of the pressure of the tax burden, regulatory burdens, and all the other problems that come out of having these deficits.

So their only proposal is: Let's spend more. And they tip-toe around it, but they cannot quite bring themselves to say what they want to do is stop the tax cuts; they want tax increases.

We need to be giving more incentives for the economy to grow. Let me talk a bit about what has been done. I will show my colleagues the difference.

It has been very difficult, but we have gotten some of the President's very important agenda through both the Senate and the House or into conference.

One of the things we could do to help the economy and create more jobs is to have increasing trade. We need to open trade. We need to make sure our companies, our farmers, and ranchers have access to markets all over the world in a truly open and free trade arrangement. We did get that through, although I think it took us 7 weeks to get the trade bill done. It was a long stretch of time, once again, because of the way it was brought up.

We also did get an energy bill through the Senate. It is still pending in conference. I think that took us about 4 weeks.

We did pass effective tax relief to help Americans keep more of their money to buy what is needed for their children at the beginning of the school year. In fact, while I had my doubts about it at the time, the rebate that was included in the tax cuts in 2001 started hitting in August, September, and October when we were feeling the effects of not only a recession that started in 2000, but also the aftereffects of what happened on September 11. As that money got into consumers' hands, they continued to buy what was needed for their families, and they have been the strongest part of the economy during a critical time.

We also had passed—and this is a case where it was bipartisan—tough corporate accountability legislation.

There are some other issues we still could do in the waning hours of this session, but I think to just make speeches and be critical of fiscal policies without offering any alternatives is the height of what we should not be doing in the Senate.

The emperor has no clothes, Mr. President. The leadership has not passed a budget. It has not passed appropriations bills. The Senate has not passed the prescription drug bill. We have not been able to get any traction on homeland security, and we have not even done pension reform. I would like people to know more about what they can count on with regard to putting money in IRAs or maybe taking money out of IRAs for education and what we are going to do in the future in terms of protecting 401(k)s and how stock options are going to be done. But that has not been brought up, and I am not sure it ever will be.

We have the opportunity in the next 3 weeks to do what must be done for our country: We can pass the Defense and military construction appropriations bills to make sure our men and women have what they need to do the job to protect America at home and abroad. We can pass this homeland security bill, create this Department that will bring some focus to our homeland security, and we can help with economic security by controlling spending and by passing such bills out of conference as the energy bill. If we do not deal with the energy needs of this country for the future, if we do not have an energy policy and someday we have a real shortfall, that could have a quick negative effect on our economy.

Those are the issues on which we can work in the next 3 weeks. Of course, we are going to need to stand up to our responsibilities and address the Iraq situation also. I think we will do that. We should focus on those issues we can do, where we can find agreement, and quit being critical without offering any alternatives.

Mr. President, I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, what is the business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

HOMELAND SECURITY ACT OF 2002

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 5005, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5005) to establish the Department of Homeland Security, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Lieberman amendment No. 4471, in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CARNAHAN). The Senator from West Virginia.

AMENDMENT NO. 4644

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, for the information of my colleagues, I have no intention of speaking at great length. I hope that other Senators will come to the floor and engage me—not necessarily engage me, but Senators will come to the floor and speak on the amendment either for or against.

I would like to see other Senators who, I am sure, are as concerned about the pell-mell rush to ram the homeland security legislation through both Houses and put it on the President's desk before much time is to be had for debate and for a clear elucidation of the pros and cons with respect to my amendment. And there are other amendments by other Senators waiting. I also have some other amendments.

I do invite other Senators on both sides of the aisle to come to the floor and participate with reference, hopefully, to my amendment.

Yesterday, the administration and the congressional Republican leadership again chastised the Senate for not acting quickly enough to pass the President's homeland security measure.

Said the very able Senate minority leader:

I fear the Senate Democrats are fiddling while Rome has the potential to burn.

"It's being talked to death," added White House spokesman, Ari Fleischer.

We are said to have been debating this bill for 3 weeks now, 10 days of debate—3 weeks.

Ten days of debate is not too long, something like 3 weeks. It takes 3 weeks to hatch an egg. I believe the distinguished Senator from Tennessee would agree with me; we are both from the hill country. He is from the hill country of Tennessee, and I am from the hill country of West Virginia. It does not make any difference how much heat you apply to that egg, it still takes at least 3 weeks for that egg to hatch out. If I am wrong in that, I would like my colleague from Tennessee to tell me.

We are talking about something that was hatched by four men, are we not, in the dark subterranean caverns of the White House?

I think a bill of this importance should be debated long enough that the Senate will know and the people will know what we are talking about, what we are about to pass. This is no small piece of legislation. It is not legislation of little moment. It is very important legislation. In my speaking on this measure thus far, I have met with a great deal of apathy. I do not believe much attention is being paid to this bill. I had urged that we not act too fast to have this bill on the President's desk before the August recess or by the time the August recess began, and then there was the idea that we ought to pass it by September 11, the first anniversary of that tragic event which occurred in New York City. And I said, no, we need to take longer. I hoped that Senators would read the bill and that Senators' aides would read the bill and that the people over at the Congressional Reference Service, the legislative people over in the Library of Congress, would have an opportunity to read this bill before we voted on it.

We have been debating this now for a few days. We look ahead to the appropriations bills that must be passed before the end of the fiscal year, the proposed adjournment date of October 6, and the November mid-term elections. It seems to be a long time for deliberation on one bill, but merely having a bill on the floor or on the calendar and actually debating it are two different things. To have the bill before the Senate and to be actually debating it are two different things.

I have my eye further ahead, years ahead, to future Congresses and future generations of Americans. I am trying to look ahead. To my way of thinking, the attention which this bill has received on this floor seems exceedingly brief. We are in the midst of an enormous undertaking. We are talking about enacting a massive reorganization of the Federal bureaucracy, a radical overhaul of our border security and immigration system, and a powerful new intelligence structure that may forever change the way Americans think about their own freedoms. It is a mighty huge responsibility that we are taking on, and we are endeavoring to do it all in one fell swoop: do it now, do it here. We have heard that advertisement on television: Do it now, do it here.

I understand the pressures to move quickly today. We live in an age of instant coffee, instant replays, and instant messages. I suppose the drive for instant legislation is a natural outgrowth. But I prefer the taste of slow brewed coffee. And I like to study the fine print in legislation I am being asked to support.

I would like to know, for instance, just exactly how many Federal workers will be employed at this new Department. I saw a recent article in The Washington Post that mentioned that the new Transportation Security Administration was slated to employ 28,000 Federal screeners when it was first created by Congress just last November. But, its Inspector General has determined that the agency will actually need 63,000 screeners—37,000 employees more than was originally anticipated. Wow. In less than a year, the size of that new agency has more than doubled.

I would like to know, since the Transportation Security Administration is supposed to be moved into the new Homeland Security Department, are these 63,000 screeners part of the 170,000 employees that we keep hearing will make up the new Department?

I would like to know if any of them are from West Virginia, for example. I would think that other Senators would want to know if these Federal employees will be from their States. After all, we are being asked to trim back their worker protections. As for that matter, I would like to know just how many of the total number of affected Federal workers are from my State. Exactly how many are from each State? I think every Senator has a legitimate interest in knowing the answer to that and many other questions.

Since we have seen the Transportation Security Agency employment figures rise so rapidly, I would be interested in learning if we can bank on that figure of 170,000 employees in the new Department or if that is just a rough "guesstimate."

While we are at it, I would like to know just exactly why these particular 28 Federal agencies and offices were selected, out of the more than 100 that have homeland security functions, to be part of this grand new Department. The administration crafted its homeland security plan in secret, so the Congress has little knowledge of why the President chose these 28 agencies and offices to be transferred. Why these offices? Why these agencies? Why not other agencies?

The Lieberman bill, like the House-passed bill, proposes to transfer to the Department the same 28 agencies and offices outlined in the President's plan. But the Governmental Affairs Committee has not developed any sort of criteria for why these agencies were chosen to be moved, other than the fact that they were identified in the President's proposal. Certainly, the Congress needs a better reason than that for transferring 28 agencies and offices and 170,000 employees.

I considered the possibility that the answer to my question might lie in the definition of "homeland security" but then I do not believe I found in the Lieberman substitute bill a definition of homeland security. It may be there, but I am not sure. I have been studying this Lieberman bill and the House bill. The Lieberman bill is an improvement over the House bill. It is leap years ahead of the House bill, but I cannot remember having found a definition of homeland security in the Lieberman bill.

Thinking, by the way, that such a definition was a pretty important thing to have in a piece of landmark legislation intended to address one of our Nation's most pressing challenges, I included a definition in my amendment.

I would be interested to know why some of the Assistant Secretaries called for in this bill have no defined functions. Under Title I, the Lieberman bill creates five assistant secretary positions within the new Department, all of whom would have to be confirmed by the Senate, but grants the President the authority to define the functions and responsibilities of these assistant secretary positions when the President submits his appointees to the Senate for confirmation. Once confirmed by the Senate, the Lieberman plan authorizes the Homeland Security Secretary to assign those functions that the Secretary deems appropriate.

The Congress should understand how the President plans to utilize these assistant secretaries before it creates their positions. What's more, it should define those responsibilities and functions in statute. Under the Lieberman plan, the President can broadly define the role of an assistant secretary, outside of the law, and, after the appointee has been confirmed by the Senate, the Secretary can alter that role, without regard to the intent of the Congress.

I would like to inquire for workers in the chemical industry and the trucking industry just exactly who is going to determine how they are supposed to deal with hazardous materials. Will the Transportation Department still make rules for trucking hazardous cargo or will all that now fall under the purview of the new Department? Are chemical plants to be subject to the powers at Homeland Security or the Environmental Protection Agency or will all of these regulatory matters be sorted out in arm-wrestling matches?

I do not believe that we have taken enough care in this bill to clearly define what we are authorizing the executive to do, and that is exactly how the President would have it. The administration wants us to be careless in our legislation so it can be reckless in its implementation. The administration does not want to be constrained by a specific plan, whether crafted in the White House or in the Congress, because the administration does not want to be pinned down on the details of its policies or the specifics of its actions.

A favorite piece of reading material for this administration apparently is "Gulliver's Travels," where we read about the Lilliputians. That is a great piece of literature; I have liked it over the years. But we have heard various Secretaries in this administration and other high officials in this administration indicate that they are very fretful, they are very irritated by the fact they are being asked to abide by certain rules. These have been longstanding rules. So the administration does not want to be tied down by any rules. We have heard them tell the story of the Lilliputians a number of times. So they do not want to be pinned down. This administration does not want to be pinned down by any rules, not pinned down on the details of its policies or the specifics of its actions.

President Bush has pressured Congress to act quickly on his proposal, insisting that because homeland security has become his top priority for the Federal Government, Congress must immediately provide him the resources and flexibility that he is demanding.

The House of Representatives passed legislation approving most of the proposal only 38 days after he submitted it to Congress. The House of Representatives passed the legislation in 2 days. Why, it would take longer than that in some communities in this Congress, some cities in this country. It would take longer than that to get a sewage permit. It would take longer than 2 days to get a sewage permit in some parts of the country. And perhaps for good reason. They passed a piece of legislation such as this with its far-reaching ramifications in 2 days in the other body.

I cannot see how either House of Congress can properly consider the merits of a new Department of Government and the transfer of 28 Federal agencies in 1 month's time, especially when the stakes are so high. But here we are with a bill before us; the clock is ticking.

I know Chairman LIEBERMAN and his committee have spent many hours on this bill. They have far more expertise on the subject matter than I have. I am not a member of that committee. I am not a member of any committee that has jurisdiction over this subject matter per se. Senator STEVENS and I were very concerned about some of the language in the House bill, certainly, in his administration proposal, about what would happen to the legislative process, how the constitutional process, the power of the purse, was being changed by the proposed legislation. So Senator STEVENS and I wrote to Senator LIEBERMAN and to Senator THOMPSON and asked that change be made in their legislation before they reported it to protect the legislative process as we have known it for over two centuries.

They worked hard. Senator LIEBERMAN and Senator THOMPSON worked very hard to craft the best bill they could craft under the circumstances. They have made a number of important improvements to the bill passed by the House. I thank the committee again, as I have thanked the committee before on several occasions, and its staff, for their efforts. But the stakes are so high and I believe we would be better off if we took further opportunities to look at the details, to study the details, to talk about ways to fill in the details. Let us remember with this legislation the Senate will be shaping not only the mission and the structure of the new Department but also the relationship that Congress will have with the Department during its lengthy transition period and throughout the process of making and implementing homeland security policy.

This legislation is going to be around quite a long time, in all likelihood, and the protections that I am interested in having in this legislation are protections for the rainy day, as well as for the day of sunshine, protections for our vital processes. These are the details that will be with us a long time. Whether it is a Democratic administration or a Republican administration, I should think we would all want to see what is best for the country, what is best for our children and grandchildren. If we are going to pass something, let it be well thought out, knowing, as I do know, that this legislation is going to be around for a long time.

We have heard that the war on terrorism is going to be a long time in its duration. I don't doubt that. We have spent nearly $20 billion in Afghanistan thus far, and we don't know whether Bin Laden is alive or dead. So this will be around for a long time.

This President and his administration, hurrying today to just have us turn this matter over to them, may not be around. Who knows. This President may be here 2 more years after this year or he may be here 6 more years or he may be here 8 more years. Who knows. Only God knows. There may be a Democratic President, a Democratic administration, there may be a Democratic House at some point. So I think we should not act with our blinders on and act only for partisan reasons because at the moment there is a Republican administration in the White House. We must not hurry this through just to get a bill through, to meet a certain date.

As Senator LIEBERMAN and I and others have said, we need to do it right. That is what I assume is the responsibility of every Senator, to do what he can to improve this bill, if it can be improved. I have never seen a bill that came to the Senate floor that couldn't be improved. Every appropriations bill that was reported to the Senate floor by my Appropriations Committee, of which I am the chairman, is always subject to amendments, and many amendments are offered and acted upon favorably. So we have room for improvement.

I do not come here as an adversary of Senator LIEBERMAN. I do not think my amendment is adversarial to his bill. I think that, even though his bill is a great improvement over the House bill, there is room for further improvement. That is not saying anything I think anyone would be offended by on his committee. I have heard of no such offense.

That is our job here, to do the best we can to come out at the end of the day with the finest product, the best product this Senate is capable of. We are talking about homeland security, the security of the people in this country. We must recognize that there is real work to be done by the Senate to make sure that all of the agencies are moved into the Department and that it is all done in a responsible way.

I understand the eagerness to pass a strong bill in order to make a strong statement. We all want to assure the public that we are acting decisively to secure the public's safety. No one wants to be portrayed as standing in the way of greater security on American soil. President Bush would have us believe he can simply create this Department out of thin air, as if by magic. It wasn't too long ago that this President and the Director of Homeland Security, Mr. Ridge, were saying: We don't need another Department. Why have another Department? Why have another Department?

Well, that is a long story. We went about, up the hill and down the hill, on the business of having the Director of Homeland Security, Mr. Ridge, come up before the Senate Appropriations Committee and testify on the budget. And of course the administration put its foot down hard. They didn't want that done. So we have sought that in that Appropriations Committee, Mr. STEVENS and I—we have on one occasion put language into an appropriations bill requiring the Director of Homeland Security to be confirmed by the Senate.

When the administration saw that Mack truck coming down the road—that bill was brought to the Senate, and it passed by a majority, a great majority; 71 Senators voted for it. Not one Senator objected to that language. Not one Senator offered an amendment to strike that language. So the administration saw that Mack truck coming and, lo and behold, the administration decided: Oh, we have to get in front of that wave. And then they came up with this marvelous piece of brainwork. It came from just four men in the bowels of the White House. They came up with this marvelous piece of magic. And now they want it passed in a hurry to create this Department of Homeland Security—which, not too long ago, as I say, the President did not seem to want, to create a Homeland Security Department, nor did Mr. Ridge.

Well, a little wave of his magic wand, a few magic words to the press, and poof, the President pulls a new Department out of his hat.

That is the old vaudeville stunt, a new rabbit out of the hat. Don't watch my right hand, watch my left hand. Watch what my left hand is doing. Don't pay any attention to my right hand. All of a sudden, he pulls a rabbit out of the hat.

The President pulls a new department out of his hat. But after the President's sleight of hand is over and the smoke clears from the stage, the task of replacing political magic with real management will begin.

I have often urged my colleagues to look to history as a guide to the future. There is much to be learned from the successes and the failures of our forefathers and we would do well to take the countenance of the past. I realize that everybody shares my love of history or see the past's connection with today and I am disappointed. But I am disconcerted when we fail to learn from our own experiences.

Last October, nearly half the Senate was thrown into disarray as the Hart Building was closed due to anthrax contamination.

I was shut out of my office. My staff were shut out of my office in the Hart Building. Many Senators were shut out of their offices, barred from our mainframes, our fax machines, our files. Our staffs were relocated, with new phones, new computers, new fax machines. Staff members couldn't reach each other, let alone our constituents. We scrambled to find ways to ensure a continuation of constituent services.

We saw how difficult it was to set up new quarters and make our offices functional again. But this bill before us is our anthrax experience many times over. And this time, the work that will be interrupted may be work that would prevent the loss of thousands more lives in another terrorist attack. I think it is worth the time to ensure that this agency is formed in the right way, from the ground up. We should take the time to work out the kinks before launching it.

Like so many government reorganizations before it, this legislation lumps together a number of disparate agencies and slaps a new sign across them. It does nothing to fill in the details of a very sketchy plan. It does nothing to resolve the inevitable problems that lie ahead. It is an opportunity to get off the hook easily. Pass something; claim the credit for passing the legislation in the upcoming election. That is probably part of the idea—claim credit for that. Go out to the American people and say: The Senate acted. We worked out a new plan. But it does nothing to resolve the inevitable problems that lie ahead. But I, for one, think we owe more to the American people than that. I think we owe more to them than that.

If the aim here is only to speed implementation of homeland security matters, let us do something to ensure that this administration and the Congress are not allowed to let development of the Department languish.

Most agree that we should act now to set the wheels in motion for a new Department, but we should not kid ourselves about what we are doing with this legislation.

The President and the Secretary of Homeland Security—if we pass the House bill—certainly will have the whole kit and caboodle. Congress will just walk off to the sideline. And, to a certain extent, the same is true with the bill that has been adopted by the committee chaired so ably by Mr. LIEBERMAN.

The President and the Secretary of Homeland Security will have to transfer 28 agencies—some say 22, some say 30—create 6 new directorates, and coordinate information and resources from countless Federal, State, and local agencies and private corporations. The administration expects Congress to hand over a blank check. They may do that in some States. Maybe the President is accustomed to having it that way in Texas. I do not know. I suppose there have been Governors in West Virginia who believed they might be entitled to a blank check on something. But we are not talking about something at the State level. This is the Federal level, and it is the Federal Constitution to which we have to pay very close attention.

The Administration expects Congress to hand over a blank check to craft this Department without additional guidance during implementation.

This expectation is not only unrealistic, it is irresponsible.

If the Senate adopts the President's proposal without making further efforts to improve it, we will have copped out! If this Senate is not willing to put in the time and attention that this new Department undoubtedly requires, I have to wonder whether we are really serious about investing responsibly in a long-term federal response to homeland security threats at all. I hope this is not all just for show!

Is that what it is? Is it all for show? Just rush the bill through so that we can say to the voters: Oh, the Senate has passed the homeland security bill. I hope it is not all for show.

The Senate must take a responsible approach toward enacting the President's proposal. If the Department of Homeland Security is worth doing, it is worth doing right, and both Houses of Congress must act deliberately to see that this Department gets up and running properly and expeditiously.

To ensure that all of these agencies and Federal workers are being moved to the right places for the right reasons, we will have to set the stage for our work after this bill is enacted. If we give the President blanket authority to transfer and reorganize these agencies without further action by Congress, the Department's transition will certainly suffer under a clumsy, trial-and-error approach that has been the death knell for so many other important government efforts before it. It will take a lot of work to get this Department where it needs to be, and Congress should not buy in to the empty promises of a one-time fix for all of the federal government's homeland security functions. We must sign up for the long haul now.

Any good carpenter knows that he will save himself a lot of headaches if he takes the time to measure twice and cut once. But in the midst of this enormous building project we have undertaken to construct a new department of government, no one is bothering to make even a rough measure of the actions we are taking.

Even if we wanted to do so, we would have nothing to measure against, because the President has not given us any workable blueprints laying out the architectural details of the Homeland Security Department. The President just shouts at us to keep building, because he wants a home for his secret war as soon as possible.

And by including all of these hurried agency transfers in his proposal, President Bush is trying to move in the furniture into this new home before he has even finished putting a roof over the Department. Given his success in pushing through his proposal, this may truly be the house that George built, and, if we don't hold our own feet to the flames, Congress will spend years making repairs to this hastily designed and poorly built structure. If his commitment to protecting homeland security is not strong enough to endure congressional involvement and public scrutiny, then our security is in serious jeopardy. And if the President's policies are not sound enough to survive the constitutional process, then we would probably be more secure without them.

Securing the safety of the American people in their own homeland will be the most important challenge of our time, and it will require responsible leadership both from the White House and from the Congress. Such leadership does not consist of hollow political solutions and public relations campaigns. When the lives of our citizens are on the line, we have a duty to rise above public approval polls and make the hard decisions about how best to protect the country's long-term interests. The President is asking us to establish the Department of Homeland Security without making these decisions, and without any clear evidence from the White House that he is willing to make the hard decisions under the processes required by the Constitution.

Congress must require of the President and of itself more than a single, open-ended plan for a new department with broad authority and a vague mission. Congress cannot allow the President to conceal his failure to produce a comprehensive homeland security strategy behind the smoke and mirrors of "managerial flexibility." If we are serious about formulating a real response to these new threats, we must press ahead to fill in all the details.

The amendment that I will be offering provides a process by which the Congress remains involved in implementation of the Department.

With the Byrd amendment, the Lieberman bill would immediately create the superstructure for a new Homeland Security Department, including the executive positions and directorates outlined in Title I of the Lieberman substitute but require additional legislation to transfer the agencies, functions, and employees to the new Department.

The amendment that I shall offer would establish a process that would allow the Congress to act within the same implementation time frame—13 months—outlined by the House-passed bill and the Lieberman substitute.

Beginning on February 3, 2003, the Homeland Security Secretary would submit recommendations for legislation to the Congress, which would be referred to the Governmental Affairs Committee in the Senate and the Government Reform Committee in the House, to transfer agencies, functions, and employees to the Directorate of Border and Transportation Protection; 120 days later, the Homeland Security Secretary would submit recommendations for legislation to transfer functions and agencies into the Directorate of Intelligence and Directorate of Critical Infrastructure Protection; 120 days later, the Homeland Security Secretary will submit recommendations for legislation to transfer agencies and functions to the Directorate of Emergency Preparedness and Response and the Directorate of Science and Technology.

The Byrd amendment gives Congress additional opportunities to work through the details about worker protections, civil liberties, privacy, secrecy, and about which agencies and functions should be transferred to the new Department.

Additionally, the Byrd amendment would give Congress the opportunity to gauge and modify how the new Department is being implemented, while it drafts legislation to transfer additional functions and agencies. The Byrd amendment would provide Congress with additional means to head off problems that traditionally plague and delay massive reorganizations.

I have defined as well as I could in this time my amendment.

I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] proposes an amendment numbered 4644.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The text of the amendment is printed in today's RECORD under "Text of Amendments.")

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

At the moment there is not a sufficient second.

The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Madam President, I rise to speak against the amendment which the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has offered. I do so, of course, with great respect for him personally, for his record of service to our country, for his record of leadership in the Senate, and for all that this Senator—and I would say every Senator—learns from him just about every day here.

I rise to speak against the amendment. I am going to try to speak clearly about why I feel so strongly against this amendment, but I certainly hope the Senator from West Virginia will understand, and colleagues as well, that I do it with great respect.

Senator BYRD has been good enough to express his appreciation for many parts of the amendment which is the proposal that emerged from the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, which I am privileged to chair, by a 12-to-5 bipartisan vote at the end of July. I appreciate those kind words.

But I must say that though Senator BYRD has said his intentions are not adversarial to the committee-reported proposal for a Department of Homeland Security, it seems to me that adoption of Senator BYRD's amendment would eviscerate our proposal. It would, as he has described it, create a superstructure, a kind of house—create the exterior of the house—but there would not be much in the house. There might be an attic, with the Secretary and some of the executives up there, but nothing underneath for at least a year, and probably well beyond that, to better protect the security of the American people here at home.

So this amendment, though it preserves the superstructure, strikes at the heart of what the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee has been working to bring forth for well over a year now.

We began our investigations on the problem of homeland security before September 11 of last year. We held hearings on matters related to homeland security before September 11. In fact, we had a hearing scheduled for September 12 on one aspect of homeland security, and we went forward with it as best we could. Half the witnesses could not make it to Washington.

We labored, in the weeks and months after September 11, holding 18 different hearings. In October, Senator SPECTER and I, introduced—in October of 2001, almost a year ago—legislation to create a Department of Homeland Security. In fairness, that legislation was based, in good part, on the work of a citizens' commission headed by our former colleagues Gary Hart and Warren Rudman. And they had been working on it since the early part of 2000.

In May of this year, our committee reported that bill that Senator SPECTER and I had introduced, together with a companion bill Senator GRAHAM had introduced, amended and approved by the committee itself by a 9-to-7 vote—unfortunately, a vote on partisan lines. All the Democratic members voted for the bill. All the Republican members, at that time, voted against it.

In June of this year—June 6, I believe it was—President Bush, after all the months before then in which the President and his administration had said an Office of Homeland Security, as filled by Governor Ridge, was enough to deal with the new challenges of homeland security—changed his mind. And I admire him for that, and I appreciate that. And I think he reached a conclusion that it would take more than an office—without statutory power, without budget authority—to meet the challenge that terrorists placed on his shoulders, and ours, to protect the security of the American people.

My friend and distinguished colleague from West Virginia said the President pulled this bill out of a hat. Well, if he pulled it out of a hat, it was a hat that belonged to the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee because so much of the proposal that the President ultimately made is exactly the same as the bill that was reported out of our committee in May.

That is why I have said, all along, that probably 90 percent of the various proposals here—the committee proposal, the President's proposal—are in agreement with one another. And we are arguing over a small number of issues, not insignificant issues, but relatively small in number compared to all we agree on. We worked to take some of the ideas the President had and added them to our bill. Still, it is mostly the same bill as our committee reported out at the end of May.

Then at the end of July—July 24 and 25—we had two very productive, extensive days of committee deliberation, a so-called markup, in which we were quite open to suggestions that had been made by Members of the Senate. I myself consulted with the various chairmen of relevant committees. Senator THOMPSON spoke to the ranking minority members, ranking Republicans on the committees. We built a better package and reported it out on July 25. Not perfect. As the Senator from West Virginia quite accurately says, no legislation that is brought before this Senate is perfect; it always can stand amendment, including this proposal.

But I must say again, with all respect, that the Byrd amendment would basically pull out of the bill most of the hard work our committee has done. It would again frame questions that our committee has worked now almost a year to answer and has presented to the Senate our best considered judgment about what the answers to those questions should be. And the basic question is, How can we best protect the security of the American people after September 11 against terrorism and threats to their security?

Senator BYRD's amendment reminds me of those board games I played as a child, and sometimes occasionally still do with children or grandchildren, where, when you hit a certain box, they tell you to go back to the beginning and start all over again. That is what adoption of this amendment would do. It would obviate all the work we have done. It would essentially say that the answers we came up with were not adequate. And it would establish a system where the administration, over the next year, would basically try to fill a house that is now empty in the Byrd amendment. Underneath the attic, where the Secretary and a few of the executives are, there is nothing to protect the security of the American people.

The administration would be required to submit—beginning early in February of next year, and every 4 months thereafter—proposals for filling in that structure. But the requirements of the Byrd amendment say that not earlier than February 3 of next year, and succeeding 120 days thereafter, would the administration be able to submit the inner workings of the Department. And there is no clear time limit as to when this Department would be up and running.

I gather that the Senator has modified or will modify his amendment to say that Congress must act on the administration's proposals for what will happen in five of the six divisions of the Department by 13 months after the effective date of the underlying legislation—that date chosen, I presume, 13 months, because our legislation says that the full Department must be up and running 13 months after the effective date.

The passage of the Byrd amendment would give the American people no guarantee that they would have a Department of Homeland Security, protecting them better than we protected them on September 11, in any time that is measurable.

I have a personal sense of urgency. Senator BYRD has spoken to it. We want to better protect the security of the American people. This is an important assignment we have taken on to create this Department. But this is an assignment that comes with a sense of urgency.

The terrorists are out there. We read every day about it, either about apprehensions or arrests of terrorists in various parts of the world. As I have said before on the floor, we defeated the Taliban in Afghanistan. We disrupted the al-Qaida bases there. But so many of them fled, and they are out there. They are not an army that we can see as a conventional army on battlefields. They are not in ships that we can observe at sea. They are hiding in the shadows of this world, in foreign countries, in our country. That is why I say that every day we go without a better organization of the various critical departments that are supposed to be protecting the homeland security of the American people is a day of greater danger for the people.

It is with that sense of urgency that our committee has brought forward our proposal. And this amendment, if passed, would take the heart out of the proposal and delay its implementation to a day that cannot be measured. That is wrong. I oppose the amendment with the greatest respect but with the greatest sincerity and intensity.

I ask my colleagues, any of whom are thinking about voting for this amendment, to explain on the floor and to their constituents how they could support this amendment and still say they are committed to the creation of a Department of Homeland Security with a sense of urgency that the reality of the terrorist threat requires.

This amendment would establish a Department of Homeland Security and a Secretary with the missions and responsibilities virtually untouched. It would also retain the basic administrative structure of the Department, as the Governmental Affairs Committee proposal has proposed.

The amendment also creates the same six directorates as in our bill, each to be headed by an Under Secretary. But as I have said, there is nothing else in this amendment within five of those six directorates. The one exception is the Immigration and Naturalization Service directorate. There are no responsibilities, no mission statements effectively, no transferred agencies.

The amendment does call, as I have said, for the Secretary of the new Department to submit to Congress, over the course of the next year, a series of legislative proposals to further the mission of the Department, including recommendations for the transfer of "authorities, functions, personnel, assets, agencies, or entities into the various directorates."

These proposals to be provided to the Congress by the Secretary would be responsible for filling in the house. That includes not only the precise list of agencies and programs to be transferred to the new Department but an enumeration of all the responsibilities of the new Department, including the fundamental policy decisions about the Department's most basic missions.
